

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at http://books.google.com/

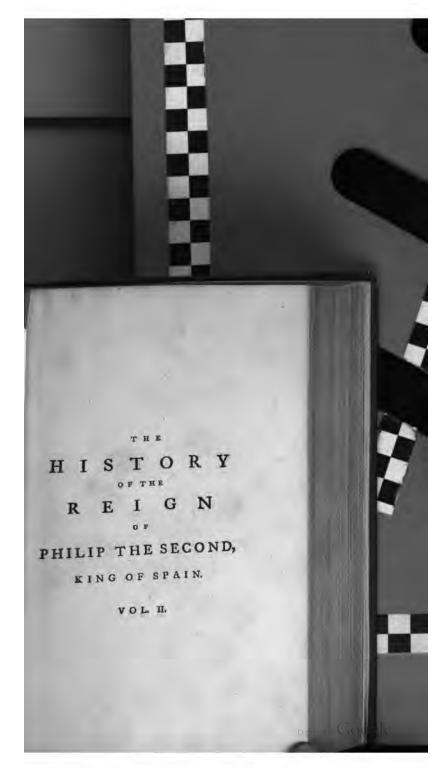

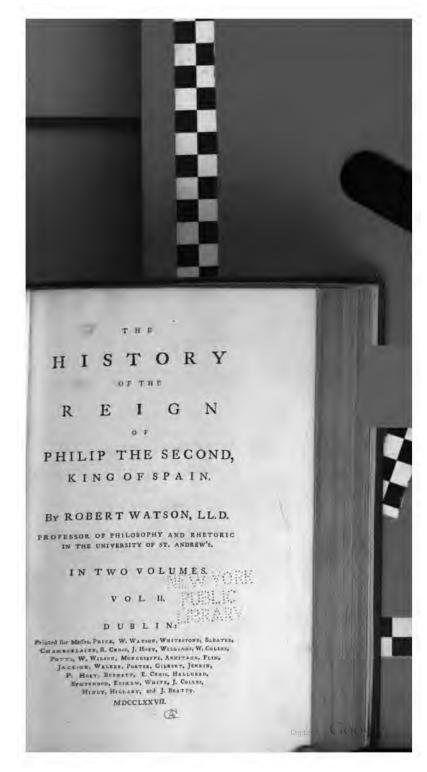

THE

HISTORY

OF THE REIGN OF

PHILIP THE SECOND,

KING OF SPAIN

BOOK XIV,

FTER the death of Requesens, who had been Boos prevented from nominating his fucceffor by the violence of his difeate, the council of flate af-furmed the reins of government; and as the king The sween-helitated for some time in his choice of a governor, bank of the he found it necessary to confirm their authority. assess

This revolution afforded great fatisfaction to the people of Holland and Zealand; who flattered themselves with hopes, that, now, when the administration was lodged in the hands of their fellow-citizens, the war would not be carried on with the same animotive and ardour as before. At first, however, the council entered heartily into the late however, the council entered heartily into the late governor's deligns, and profecuted, with vigour, the plan of operations which he had left unfinished. And they continued to do so till their attention was called to objects of a fill more interesting uature, than the reduction of the maritime provinces.

Vot. II.

Digitized by

HISTORY

PHILIP THE SECOND,

BOOK XIV.

FTER the death of Requesens, who had been prevented from nominating his successor by the violence of his disease, the council of state assumed the reins of government; and as the king The government he stated for some time in his choice of a governor, hands of the he found it necessary to confirm their authority.

This revolution afforded great fatisfaction to the people of Holland and Zealand; who flattered themselves with hopes, that, now, when the administration was lodged in the hands of their fellow-citizens, the war would not be carried on with the same animosity and ardour as before. At first, however, the council entered heartily into the late governor's designs, and prosecuted, with vigour, the plan of operations which he had left unfinished. And they continued to do so till their attention was called to objects of a still more interesting nature, than the reduction of the maritime provinces.

THE

Book XIV. 1576. Mutiny of the Spanish troops.

THE Spanish cavalry had, as already mentioned. begun to mutiny before the death of Requesens. During the siege of Ziricsee, the infantry remained obedient to their commanders, partly from being kept in perpetual employment, and partly from the hopes of enriching themselves by the plunder of that city; but being disappointed in these hopes by the articles of the capitulation, and large arrears being due, to the payment of which even the contributions of the people of Ziricsee were not applied , they flew to arms, deposed their officers, elected others, and a commander in chief from among themselves; and then, having fworn mutual fidelity over the facred hoft, they abandoned all their conquests which had cost them fo much labour and blood, and passed over to Brabant; intending to take possession of some confiderable fortified place, from whence they might make excursions, and plunder the neighbouring towns and villages.

They seize

THE council of state sent count Mansveldt to appease them; but no offers or promises which the count was empowered to make, could divert them from their design. They hoped, by the rapidity of their march, to have entered Brussels by introvite; but both the inhabitants and garrifor were prepared to oppose them. They failed like wife in an attempt on Mechlin. Then leaving Brabant, they turned fuddenly towards Allost in Flanders; and made themselves masters of that town, by climbing over the walls, in the middle of the night, when the citizens were off their They could not have acquired possession of a place more suitable to their design; as it was fituated in the midst of a rich and fertile country. and lay at nearly an equal diffance from Bruffels.

* Meteren says, that the Walloom laid hold of the money and with great dexterity excluded the Spaniards from the town fels, Ghent, and Antwerp. They had no fooner Book displayed the standard of rebellion in Allost, than they were joined by most of the other Spanish troops in the Low Countries; after which they began to exercise every species of violence and outrage, both against the citizens and the inhabitants of the country round.

THE prince of Orange remained not idle or unconcerned, in this critical conjuncture. He had too much fagacity not to discern, and too much zeal and dexterity not to avail himself of so favourable an opportunity of advancing his designs. By his letters, and emissaries, he endeavoured to rouse the spirit of the people, and to persuade the council, "That now was the time when they might deliver themselves for ever from the tyranny of Spain. By the good providence of God, the government had fallen into their own hands. It ought to be their unalterable purpose, to hold fast the power which they possessed, and to employ it in delivering their fellow-citizens from that intolerable load of misery under which they had fo long groaned. The measure of the calamities of the people, and of the iniquities of the Spaniards, was now full. There was nothing worse to be dreaded than they had already fuffered; and nothing to deter them from resolving either to expel their rapacious tyrants, or to perish in the glorious attempt."

THESE exhortations, enforced by accounts They are which were propagated of the enormities commit-declared reted by the Spanish troops, found an easy admit-council. tance into the minds of persons of all ranks. council of state were no less enflamed than the people; and resolved to publish an edict, declaring the Spaniards to be rebels against the king. laimont, Mansveldt, Viglius, even the Spanish officers of the highest rank, and Rhoda, president B 2

HISTORY OF THE REIGN OF

1576.

Book of the council of tumults, seemed at first inclined to concur with the other counsellors; but perceiving that their resentment was not confined to the mutineers, but extended likewise to all the friends of the Spanish government, they began to alleviate the outrages of the foldiers, and openly opposed the publication of the edict; alleging, that troops which had mutinied on account of not receiving their pay, could not justly be considered as rebels. and that the edict would serve only to exasperate them still more against the people, while the council was not provided with force sufficient to restrain their excesses. But these reasons were held in great contempt by a majority of the council; who, having expelled the diffenting members. accused them of holding correspondence with the mutineers, and threw them into prison. having elected the duke d'Arschot for their president, in the room of Viglius, they published an edict in terms strongly calculated to increase the odium against the Spanish troops; calling on the people to concur with them in driving out that lawless and rapacious crew, who, under the pretext of procuring payment of their would, if they were not speedily prevented, bring utter ruin upon the Netherlands.

Hostilities Spaniards and Flemings.

Nothing could have been more conforant to between the the general spirit of the Flemings, than the sentiments contained in this edict. It ferved as fuel to that flame which was already kindled, and which now burst out with redoubled violence. greater weight to the measures which had been already taken, and to those which they intended to purfue, the council called an affembly of the States; and all the provinces, Luxemberg excepted, sent deputies to attend. This assembly had no fooner met than hostilities were begun. citadels of Antwerp, Ghent, Valenciennes, and Utrecht were in the hands of the Spaniards. mero garrifoned by fome companies of German infantry. To acquire possession of these important fortresses.

mero commanded in Lieres; and Maestricht was Book 1576.

and to prevent the Spanish troops from uniting themselves into one body, were the objects upon which the States bestowed their first and principal attention. They were fuccessful in gaining over to their fide the regiments of Walloons in the Spanish service; and they raised so great a number of the militia of the country, as, when joined with the Walloons, formed a confiderable body of troops.

THE Spaniards, on the other hand, prompted by Rhoda, and animated by the brave and active d'Avila, exerted themselves no less strenuously in counteracting their deligns. An officer of the name of Vargas, having drawn together eight hundred horse in the neighbourhood of Maestricht, had advanced as far as Visenach, in his way to Allost, in hopes of prevailing on the mutineers to At Visenach he was met act in concert with him. by two thousand foot and six hundred horse, which the States had fent to oppose him. But the Spaniards were not fo much inferior in number, as they were superior in military discipline. supplied his want of infantry by making a company of Burgundians quit their horses. The Flemish troops, though they began the attack with great impetuolity, fell soon into disorder; and the Spaniards broke in upon their ranks, and put them to flight, with confiderable flaughter.

VARGAS continued his route to Allost; and was feconded, in his application to the mutineers, by d'Avila and Romero; but neither the importunity of their officers, nor a regard to the honour of their nation, or to their personal safety, could overcome their obstinate resolution to remain in Allost, till they should receive payment of their arrears. From Allost, Vargas led his troops,

Book with the utmost expedition, to Maestricht, which, he was informed, the Germans in garrison there had agreed to deliver to the States. The execution of their design had been retarded by some companies of Spaniards, a part of whom were in possession of one of the gates, and the rest stationed in the town of Vich. This town lies on the east fide of the river, and is connected with Maestricht by a bridge over the Maese. Vargas, having transported his troops, and joined his countrymen at Vich, had a sharp engagement with the townsmen upon the bridge; but as they were not fupported by the Germans, he foon compelled them to retire. They paid dear for this attempt to affert their liberty. The Germans, instead of acting as their friends, united with the Spaniards, and

The facking and plunder people of Maestricht experienced on this occasion, by the Spa- was effaced by those which soon afterwards befell the citizens of Antwerp. The States had laboured in vain to persuade the Spanish garrison in the citadel to deliver it into their hands.

tadel to deliver it into their hands. They now refolved to compel them; and, with this view, they had brought into the city a numerous body of Walloons and other troops. They had much reason for that solicitude with which they desired to get possession of this important fortress; which, on the one side, communicated with the town, by a spacious esplanade, and on the other, with the adjacent country. The States were not sufficiently aware of the danger to which, from these two circumstances united, the city of Antwerp was exposed. Champigny the governor had endeavoured to rouse their attention to this danger, and had earnestly exhorted them to block up the esplanade both together plundered the town without mercy .

b Meteren, p. 164. Bentivoglio, p. 178.

He was brother to cardinal Granvelle, and was as averse from the Spanish interest as his brother was attached to it.

esplanade by batteries and trenches; and, at the Book XIV. fame time, to order all the troops that could be spared, to encamp without the town, so as to prevent the Spaniards at Allost and other places from entering the citadel. But they wholly neglected the latter part of this advice, and they were too late in beginning to put the former in execution, They believed that the garrison would not venture to fally out upon the town, in which there was so great a number of troops to oppose them; and they flattered themselves with the hopes of being able to compel them to furrender, before they could receive assistance from their countrymen. purpose, two strong batteries were planted on the esplanade; while the townsmen were employed either in pushing forward the trenches, or in raising mounds for the security of the town.

THE siege of the castle of Ghent was carried on at the fame time, and the States had conceived the most fanguine expectation of fuccess; when the noise of the artillery reached from both places to the mutineers in Allost; and, awakening in them fome sparks of their native warlike ferocity, produced a more powerful effect upon their minds, than all the exhortations and entreaties of their commanders.

NAVARESE, their elect or leader, seized dexteroufly this opportunity which their present difpolition afforded him; and, calling them together, exhorted them to reflect upon the folly of fuffering the fortresses besieged to fall into the hands of the Flemings. "That artillery," faid he, "which is now thundering in our ears, is levelled against us, no less than against the garrisons of Ghent and Antwerp. When the Flemings shall have subdued the rest of our countrymen, can we doubt that they will next turn their arms against us, who are the principal objects of their relentment? Can you imagine that the States B۷ Book will then lend a more favourable ear, than at prefent, to your requests? Believe me, they will ere long extinguish the debt which they owe you, in your blood. Let us march instantly to the relief of the citidal of Antwerp. We shall soon oblige the enemy to raise the siege. We shall, in spite of the townsmen, and the raw troops which they have brought to their affiftance, make ourselves masters of the richest city in the world, and take ample revenge for the unworthy treatment we have received."

1576.

> HE would have proceeded; but was prevented by shouts of applause, and exclamations from every quarter, to arms! To arms! They were now as impatient to leave Alloft, as they had formerly been reluctant. On the 3d day of November, and only a few hours before funfet, they began their march; hoping to reach the citadel of Antwerp early next morning, unobserved by the enemy. Having found greater difficulty in passing the Scheld than they expected, they did not arrive till noon; notwithstanding which, being joined by four hundred horse, under Vargas and Romero, who had acted in concert with Navarese. they entered the citadel, without meeting the least opposition. The citizens were no sooner informed of their arrival, than they suspected their design, and were filled with the most dreadful apprehensions. Champigny the governor, whose advice had been so unfortunately disregarded, saw the approaching storm, and did every thing in his power to avert it.

> Bur the impetuolity of the mutineers did not leave him time for completing the arrangements which he intended. These men, impelled at once by avarice and revenge, rejected with disdain the invitation given by d'Avila to repose and refresh themselves after their march. With rage and fury in their countenances, they demanded the fignal nal to advance; calling out, that they were de- Book termined, before night, either to perish in the conflict, or to fix their quarters in the city. They were in number between two and three thousand. and the garrison, together with the troops brought by Vargas and Romero, amounted nearly to the fame number. Navarese the elect led on the mutineers, and the remainder were commanded by Romero. Nothing could exceed the intrepidity with which these two determined bands, vying with each other, attacked the trenches. tizens displayed at the first onset, great bravery and resolution; but, being unable long to withstand the impetuous attack of the Spaniards, and being galled at the same time by the artillery of the citadel, they at length gave way, and fled with precipitation along the two streets which lead from the parade into the centre of the city. The Spaniards were seconded by their cavalry; which bore down all before them, and followed close upon the rear of the vanquished, till they reached the great square, in the centre of which, stands the Guildhall or Palace. There the fugitives, being joined by some fresh troops, made a halt, and rallied; but they were foon broken a fecond time, and would have been all cut to pieces, if they had not taken shelter in the palace, and in the houses of the square. From the windows they kept, for some time, a brisk fire upon the enemy, and did confiderable execution; but the Spaniards, who were accompanied by the retainers of their camp, fet fire to the houses, with hay, straw, and other combuttible materials, not sparing even the palace itself; which was esteemed one of the richeft and most magnificent in the world. It was quickly reduced to ashes; and of those who had taken refuge in it, some perished in the slames, and fome by the fword, in attempting to escape, while others frantic with despair flung themselves headlong from the windows.

THE

Book XIV.

1576.

THE Spaniards then dispersed themselves over the city; overpowering all opposition with irresistible impetuofity. Had their number been fufficient either to murder, or to overtake the prodigious crowds that fled before them, the blood and carnage of that memorable day would have been still more dreadful. Of the citizens near feven thousand perished; while the loss of the Spaniards amounted only to two hundred men. So great is the fuperiority in battle, of regular discipline, and For though the prompt obedience to command. citizens fought with extraordinary courage, like men whose all was at stake, they acted not in concert, and although they had been marshalled by Champigny, as well as the time would allow, yet, from want of practice, they were foon thrown into confusion; and, from the same cause, they were unable to recover their ranks, or return to the charge.

JUSTICE would oblige us to bestow on the Spanish troops the praise due to the most heroic valour, if, besides the rapacity which impelled them. they had not disfigured the luftre of their victory by exercifing a degree of barbarous cruelty, of which, at that period, the Spaniards alone, of all the nations in Europe, feem to have been capable. Antwerp, at the time of this catastrophe, was in the most flourishing condition. Companies of merchants from almost every commercial nation, refided in it, possessing storehouses and factories filled with the most precious commodities. numbers of the citizens too were the wealthiest in Their magnificent houses were adorned Europe. with the most costly furniture; and their shops and warehouses stored with prodigious quantities of gold and silver stuffs, and all other kinds of valuable effects, collected from every corner of the globe. Upon these the Spaniards seized, without any discrimination of the owners, and without confidering.

1576.

fidering whether the persons whom they pillaged, Book were friends or enemies. The plunder that lay open and unconcealed was immense; but was far from being sufficient to satiate the avarice of the Spaniards. They exercised the most unrelenting cruelty upon all whom they suspected to have concealed their treasures; and nothing was to be heard in the city, but either the shrieks and groans of the fufferers, or the lamentations of those whom they compelled to witness the torments of their hulbands, wives, or children. Contemporary historians have described some of the several species of torture which they inflicted; but the reader's modesty would be offended, and his humanity shocked by the recital 4.

In this manner were these men, for three days and nights, employed in plundering and butchering by turns, a people who were subjects of the same prince as themselves, and from whom (whatever ground of complaint they might pretend against the council of State) they had never received the smallest injury, or provocation. Nor does it appear that their officers interposed their authority, to moderate their excesses, till the soldiers, exhausted with fatigue, were about to give over of themselves.

THE money in specie which was extorted, amounted at least to eight millions of guilders, befides a prodigious quantity of gold and filver, in plate, stuffs, and furniture, which the owners were not able to redeem. The loss which the people of Antwerp fustained by the burning of fo many buildings, was not less than what they suffered by the rapacity of the soldiers. The most beautiful part of the city was burnt to the ground; and great numbers of shops and warehouses, containing the richest goods, were confumed to ashes.

WHILST

d Thuanus and Meteren. e Meteren, p. 164. Thuanus, tom. iii. p. 471. Bentivoglio, p. 178. Digitized by Google 1576. The States receive affiftance from Orange.

BOOK

XIV.

WHILST the barbarity exercised against the inhabitants of Antwerp, excited fentiments of compassion towards the unhappy sufferers, it greatly augmented that abhorrence which the Flemings already entertained towards the Spaniards, and made the Prince of them more folicitous than ever to deliver themselves from a yoke which was now become intolerable. But the great superiority which the Spanish troops discovered on every occasion over the raw undisciplined forces of the States, created much anxiety, with regard to the fuccess of their The council of state perceived the endeavours, necessity of having recourse to foreign aid; and they willingly accepted an offer, which was made them at this juncture by the prince of Orange, of fome cannon, ammunition, and troops, with which they pushed forward the siege of the citadel of Ghent, and foon obliged the garrison to capitulate.

> This seasonable assistance contributed not a little to advance the prince's views. Immediately after the death of Roquesens, he had projected a scheme of uniting all the provinces, and had exerted himself with great activity and address, in carrying it into execution. The States entered rea-Deputies were appointed, and dily into his ideas. invested with proper powers, by the several provinces; and in the congress, which was held at Ghent, a treaty of confederacy was concluded, under which all the provinces, except Luxemburg, were comprehended.

The confederacy of Ghent.

November 3th, 1576.

> In this confederacy, so well known in the history of the Netherlands by the name of the Pacification of Ghent, it was agreed between the Catholic provinces on the one hand, and those of Holland and Zealand, with the prince of Orange, on the other, that there should subsit between them, an inviolable alliance, peace, and friendship; that all past injuries should be buried in oblivion; that all prisoners.

1576.

prisoners, and in particular the count de Bossut, Book should be set at liberty without ransom; that the contracting parties should, to the utmost of their power affift each other in expelling the Spaniards from the Netherlands; that as foon as the provinces should be delivered from these bloody oppressors, and tranquillity established, a general assembly should be held of the States of all the provinces, for redressing grievances, reforming abuses, and restoring the constitution to its primæval state; that the prince of Orange should remain high admiral and governor of the maritime provinces; and that he, and all others, whose property had been confiscated, should be reinstated in their posfessions and dignities; that the decrees of the duke of Alva, relative to the tumults and herefy, should be abolished; but that in the Catholic provinces, only the Roman Catholic religion should be exercifed; while in those of Holland and Zealand, all matters, whether civil or religious, should remain on their present footing, till a general assembly of all the States should be held

THE deputies who were now convened, whom Arrival of the historians call likewise by the name of the Don Johnof Austria. States, entered immediately upon the execution of the articles of this confederacy, by transporting to the frontier of France such of the Spaniards as had been taken prisoners in the citadel of Ghent: and they had begun to make preparations to dislodge them from other places; when they were informed that Don John of Austria, whom Philip had made choice of for governor, had arrived in the province of Luxemburg. In some respects, Don John was admirably qualified for this new station. to which his brother had appointed him. His affable and infinuating manners were fitted to conciliate Meteren, p. 169. Bentivoglio, l. 9. sub fine. Thuanus, 1 62. lect. 13.

HISTORY OF THE REIGN OF

Book ciliate the affections of the people whom he was fent to govern; and his military accomplishments qualified him to pursue the war with vigour, against the revolted provinces. But in the critical situation into which the late enormities of the Spaniards had brought the Netherlands, other talents besides these were requisite; such as prudence, patience, and self-command, together with skill and dexterity in managing the passions, and the prejudices of men; qualifications which Don John possessed not in any considerable degree.

His imprudence.

14

His conduct upon his first arrival was ill calculated to allay those suspicions which the Flemings entertained of the king's defign in fending him to the Netherlands. Having stopt at Luxemburg, he wrote letters to the council and the States, in which he informed them, that he would not come to Bruffels, the usual residence of their governors, unless hostages were given him for their peaceable behaviour, a guard appointed for the security of his person, and the same unlimited command of the fleet and army conferred upon him, which the preceding governors had enjoyed. He lamented the outrages which had been committed by the Spanish troops; and promised, that, if the States and people should maintain their obedience to the king, and their profession of the catholic faith, the injuries which they had fustained, should not pass unpunished. But he added, that if they failed in either of these respects, they should, in that event, find him no less prepared for war, than he was inclined to peace.

The States apply for advice to the Prince of Orange.

The States and council were ignorant, till they received these letters, of the light in which their late conduct was considered by the court of Spain. They believed that, as the steps which they had taken were necessary for the preservation of the people, people, it was impossible they could be offensive B o o x. to the king; and they were extremely surprised, thus to meet, not only with diffrust, but even threats, and a defiance, where they were conscious of having merited approbation and applause. They trembled therefore at the thoughts of puttingthemfelves in the power of the new governor, and were greatly at a loss to determine what answer they should return to his demands. On this occasion, they had recourse to the Prince of Orange for advice. And William readily embraced the opportunity, which was thus prefented to him, of confirming his countrymen in those suspicions to which the governor's conduct had given rife.

8 Meteren, p. 174.

1576.

"As it was but too manifest," he said, "from His advice. the strain of Dohn John's letter, that he intended to Dated Notread in the footsteps of his predecessors, the States 30th, 1576. and council had much need to exert all their firmnels, prudence, and circumspection. They ought feriously to consider of the important charge with which they were intrusted; and to remember, that, upon their present conduct it depended, whether they, and their wives, and children, and fellow citizens, should for the future enjoy those rights which belonged to them as natives of the Low Countries, or should be again exposed to the lawless tyranny of the Spaniards. They ought to exercise with vigour the power which they possessed, and resolutely reject all terms of agreement with the governor, by which the fundamental laws of the State might be brought into danger, or their own authority abridged. Enter not, said he, into any accommodation with him, till the Spaniards, and all other foreign troops be actually dismissed. Trust not to any foothing promifes which he may give you, of dismissing them at a more convenient seaion. Remember how the king himself, when he went to Spain, affured you, that the troops which he then left behind him, should, in three months afterwards.

Book afterwards, be withdrawn, and yet they were sufxiv. fered to remain for more than a year and a half; 1576.

and would, notwithstanding your solicitations, have still remained, if the calamity which befell his army for him in Africa, had no tmade it necessary to remove them. Let no consideration persuade you to listen to Don John's request of being invested with the unlimited command of your forces. By granting this, you will furnish him with weapons against yourselves. Nothing can express his distrust more strongly, than his unprecedented requisitions of hostages, and a guard for the security of his per-If you comply with these demands, you will enable him to annihilate your authority, and to trample under foot your most sacred rights and laws. It is impossible to believe that one who discovers fo much folicitude to strip you of your power, can seriously intend your welfare. Is it not more reasonable that the governor should trust the States, than that the States should lay themselves at the mercy of the governor? Such demands were never made, even by your princes themselves; whose practice always was to come unarmed to your affemblies, and to take an oath to maintain your privileges, before they received from you any promise of obedience. Consent not to put yourselves under the power of John of Austria, upon easier terms than have been ever infifted upon with your native princes. Require him, previously to his admission, to interpose his authority for the immediate departure of the Spanish troops; and solemnly to engage to govern the State according to its fundamental laws. To these conditions, your late fatal experience will justify you, if you add, that you shall have the power of assembling yourselves twice, or even thrice a year, if you shall judge it to be expedient; that the citadels shall be rafed

h Here the prince mentions the particular privileges to which he alludes, and the times when they were obtained. Meteren, P. 175.

XIV.

rased to the ground; that the right of appointing the governors and magistrates shall be vested in you; and that without your consent, no military force shall be levied, and no garrisons stationed in the towns or forts. At present, it little imports you to consider whether or not this conduct will give offence to the king, for it is mere delusion, if you flatter yourselves that you have not already offended him. Promises, soothing speeches, and professions of affection on his part, will not be wanting; but you will discover the last degree of weakness, if, after what you have experienced for feveral years past, you are not sensible, that nothing now remains for you, but either miserably to bend under the yoke, from which you have so happily escaped, or to employ with vigour and fortitude the means with which Providence has furnished you; and which, I doubt not, may yet prove effectual for your security, provided you maintain harmony and concord among yourselves 1."

This letter, in some measure, produced the The States desired effect. It put to silence all those who to so foreign were for receiving Don John on his own terms; powers, and the States, more suspicious than ever of his design, resolved to insist upon the dismission of the troops, and the confirmation of the pacification of Ghent, as conditions, without which they would never agree to acknowledge his authority. And that they might not be found unprepared, in case of his resulal, they gave orders for making new levies; drew together an army at Wavre, between Brusses and Namur; and dispatched ambassadors to solicit assistance from foreign courts.

In Germany, where they were powerfully feconded in their applications by the prince of Orange, they engaged in their interest, John Cafimire, count palatine of the Rhine. In France they did not confine their application to the Cal-Vol. II.

Meteren, p. 175, 176. Bentivoglio, lib, ix. ab initio. Thuanus, I. Ixii. fect. 15.

Book XIV. . 1576. vinists, but likewise prevailed upon the duke of Anjou, the king's brother, to espouse their cause, by setting before him the prospect of an establishment in the Low Countries, more fuitable to his rank than he could expect to obtain in his brother's dominions. From the queen of England, their envoy met with the most gracious reception. was matter of the highest satisfaction to this sagacious princess, to see her inveterate enemy thus embroiled with his Flemish subjects; but, as she was itili desirous to avoid an open rupture with Philip, the chose to affift them with money rather than with troops, and gave them 40,000 pounds, with a promise of continuing her favour, on condition (which she added in order to save appearances) that they should adhere to the pacification of Ghent, and not throw off their allegiance to their legal fovereign.

Their negociation with Don John.

WHILE the States were making these preparations to vindicate their rights by force of arms, they fincerely defired to attain their end, by negociation with the governor. For they had too long groaned under the calamities of war, not to wish most earnestly for peace, provided that blessing could be fecured, without making a facrifice of their liberties. Don John, on the other hand, difcovered an extreme reluctance to comply with the conditions which they required of him; but he endeavoured to differable his fentiments, and attempted, by fair speeches, to cajole and deceive them. Still, however, he continued to shew his diffidence, by infifting upon having a numerous guard for his person; and by refusing his consent to the departure of the Spaniards, unless the States should at the same time dismis all the foreign troops in their fervice, and give hostages, to remain in the hands of a neutral power, till their engagements should be fulfilled.

THE States, whose jealousy was kept alive by the repeated warnings of the prince of Orange,

Digitized by Goog Eafily

1577-

Digitized by

PHILIP II. KING OF SPAIN.

eafily penetrated into Don John's deligns; and Book they refolved, if possible, to convince him, by one decisive step, that it was in vain for him to expect they would ever depart from the terms proposed. In their affembly at Bruffels, on the 5th of January, 1577, they drew up a new deed of union, in which they engaged in the most folemn manner, to maintain inviolably for ever the pacification of Ghent; to spare neither their goods, their persons, nor their lives, in order to fulfil it; and to regard as perjured traitors, all those who, participating in the present union, should by word, deed, or coun-fel, counteract it. A copy of this deed, subscribed by the governor and deputies of all the towns and provinces, by the nobility, prelates, and other dig-nified ecclefiaftics; and by the members of tribunals, councils, colleges, and chapters, together with a folernn ratification of it by the council, was fent by the States to Don John, as their final answer to his demands *,

This measure contributed not a little to pro- The strelmote the end proposed. It gave Don John a proof ment of firmness, on the part of the States, which he little expected, and shewed him the necessity of either agreeing to the conditions which they fo carneflly required, or of resolving instantly to have recourse to arms. Inflamed by ambition and the love of war, he would not have hefitated a moment what part to act, had not his inftructions from the king required that he should avoid coming to an open rupture with the Catholic provinces. He confidered likewife, that the States had got the flart of him, and were already well prepared to repel force by force. Nor was he ignorant of the encouragement which they had received, to hope for fuccour from the neighbouring powers; or of the danger to which great numbers of the Spanish troops, furrounded by their enemies, were expor-ed, of being reduced by famine. Influenced by these considerations, and trusting, that ere long, after quieting their sufficients, opportunities would offer of depriving the States by degrees of that power of which they were at present so tenacious, he entered into a negociation with their deputies at Marche en Famine, a city in Luxemburg; and after many obstructions and difficulties, concluded March 12th, a treaty with them, which they fondly termed the perpetual edict.

HISTORY OF THE REIGN OF

20

In this treaty he engaged, that all the foreign troops in the service of Spain should leave the Netherlands, and never return thither without the consent of the States; that the Spaniards and Italians should depart within the space of forty days, and the Germans, immediately after receiving satisfaction with regard to their arrears; and that all the cities and forts possessed by these troops should, as soon as they were relinquished, be delivered to the States, together with the stores of ammunition, arms, and provisions. He ratified the pacification of Ghent. He consented that all prisoners detained on account of the late disturbances, should immediately be set at liberty, except the count of Buren 1. And he promised that diligent enquiry should be made, concerning the outrages lately committed by the troops; that justice should be executed against the guilty, and a reasonable compensation made to the sufferers, either in the Netherlands, or in Spain, according as the king should be pleased to determine.

THE States, on the other hand, engaged to preferve inviolable their allegiance to the king; to maintain the profession of the Roman Catholic faith throughout all the provinces; to receive Don John as governor general of the Netherlands, and immediately to furnish him with 600,000 florins, for the payment of the Italian and Spanish troops, in order to prevail on them the more easily to depart for Spain or Italy.

The States of Holland refuse to conceur.

As soon as this treaty was concluded, ambasseuries fadors were dispatched by the Catholic States, who alone were concerned in it, to the prince of Orange, which they owed to the queen of England and the duke of Anjou; and certain articles of the treaty were derogatory to the honour of the Netherlands: particularly that article, by which, instead of inlisting upon a restitution of those invaluable effects. of which the Spaniards had plundered the inhabitants, they had promised money to those men, notwithstanding their having been solemnly declared traitors and rebels by the States themselves. and by the council of state, when clothed with the authority of the king.

1 Son of the prince of Orange.

Book 1577.

Departure troops.

THE Catholics could not but be fensible of the of the Italian spanish strength of these objections. Their impatience to be delivered from the Spanish troops, and their eager defire of peace, had betrayed them into that precipitation of which they had been guilty. They could not avail themselves now of the superior penetration of the prince of Orange. The treaty was already concluded, and nothing remained for them, but to watch the governor's motions with an attentive eye, till the troops were removed to fuch a distance, that they could not easily be re-Don John was at great pains to dispel their suspicions. For that purpose, he employed all his influence to persuade the Spaniards to depart; and he at length prevailed, though not till he had distributed among them the money which he had received from the States. This brave, but ferocious, and favage band then fet out upon their march for Italy, like an army in triumph; loaden with the spoils of their fellow-subjects, and without compunction for the rapacity and violence which they had exercised ...

departure diffused universal THEIR Pon Joha's admission to throughout the Netherlands, and the people indulged the flattering hope, that the king, having been at last touched with their calamities, had refolved to treat them with greater lenity and moderation than they had experienced fince the beginning ginning of his reign. Their satisfaction was Book heightened by the popular character of the governor, who was in the prime of life; elegant and graceful in his person and deportment; lively, facetious and affable, and who gained exceedingly from the comparison which men naturally formed of his infinuating manners, with the referve and austerity of the king. He was received in Brusfels with fuch marks of respect as had never been fhewn to any former governor; and persons of all ranks flattered themselves with the prospect of a just and mild administration.

Thuanus, lib. lxiv. fect. 6.

1577.

THEY did not long enjoy this alluring prospect. His impolities Although Philip himself had ratified the perpetual conduct. edict, and Don John had, before his admission to the regency, fworn in the most solemn manner, to observe it, it soon appeared that nothing was farther from the intentions of either. The limitations which that edict imposed upon the fovereign's authority, were utterly repugnant to Philip's temper, as well as to the plan which he had formed for the government of the Netherlands; nor would he ever have empowered his brother to make so many concessions to the States, as the perpetual edict, or pacification of Ghent, contained, but in order more effectually to strip them afterwards of that very power which he now consented they should enjoy. But Don John was, from his natural impetuofity, incapable of executing this scheme, which required a much higher degree of circumspection and experience, as well as patience and dissimulation, than he possessed. His court was perpetually filled with Spaniards, and other foreigners, who had rendered themselves obnoxious to the natives; nor were any of the Flemings admitted into his confidence, but fuch as had shewn themselves devoted to the Spanish interest: while those who had discovered an attachment to the liberty of their country, were kept at a distance, and treated with indifference or con-1577.

Book tempt. This circumstance contributed not a little to revive that jealousy of his designs, which he had been so solicitous to allay. But the States were still more alarmed, when he made them the following proposals: that they should not any longer withhold from him the authority which his predecessors had enjoyed, but allow him to act as captain-general, as well as governor of the provinces: that they should empower him, without waiting for the determination of the general assembly of the States, to execute the two articles of the late treaty, which related to the obedience due to the king, and the re-establishment of the Catholic religion; and that, if the prince of Orange would not immediately agree to accede to the perpetual edict, the States should break off all correspondence with him, and reduce him and the maritime provinces to obedience, by force of arms. these proposals the States refused to comply, but expressed their refusal in the softest terms; and •without taking notice of his demand, to be allowed to act as captain-general, they represented to him that, by the pacification of Ghent, both he and they were bound to wait for the meeting of the general assembly of the States; to whose decision the prince of Orange, and the States of Holland and Zealand, had engaged to submit.

Don John perceiving that he was not likely to persuade them, grew more impatient than ever under his present restraints, and resolved now to employ either force or fraud, as opportunities His duplicity should offer. The States could not fully penetrate his defign, but they perceived how much he was diffatisfied with his fituation, and what difficulty they would find to obtain the fulfilment of his engagements in the perpetual edict. This ferved to render them more than ever folicitous for the departure of the German troops, which, it had been agreed, should remain in the Netherlands, till they received payment of their arrears. These arrears amounted to a very great fum, which the 1577.

States were utterly unable to raise at the present Book juncture. But, having raised a part of it, they made an offer of that to the Germans, and defired they would accept of goods and fecurity for the rest. In order to make a further trial of Don John's fincerity, they intreated him to employ his influence, to procure their confent. Don John readily agreed to his request; and declared that, if the Germans should refuse to comply, he would, at the hazard of his life, compel them. Having furnmoned their commanders to meet him at Mechlin, he went thither, as if on purpose to perfuade them; but in reality to inflame their minds against the States, and to exhort them to remain in the Netherlands, in the service of the king. Having had the fuccess which he desired with some of the principal officers, and judging it necessary now to redouble his hypocrify with the States, he wrote to them, lamenting that a much greater fum was necessary to satisfy the German troops, than could be procured in the Low Countries; and offering to fend his fecretary Escovedo to reprefent their situation to the king. This artifice was not altogether without effect. The States could not believe that Don John was capable of so great deceit, as he was now practifing against them. They agreed to his proposal, and, as an expression of their gratitude, they settled a pension of 2000 ducats on Escovedo, who set out immediately for Spain; but with a design extremely different from that which was pretended.

DON JOHN in the mean time carried on his in-He faires on the cattle of trigues with the German officers, and hoped foon, Namur. by their means, to get possession of the fortified towns in which they lay. But before any of the plans which he had formed with this view were put in execution, he judged it necessary to withdraw from Brussels, and, if possible, to make himself master of some place of strength near the frontier, where he might remain in safety till he should find himfelf Digitized by Google 1577.

Book himself in a condition to take the field. Of all the xiv. frontier towns, Namur appeared the fittest for his purpose; being conveniently situated for the reception of the troops, to which he expected the king would foon give orders to return from Italy. It happened that Margaret de Valois, queen of Navarre, intended at this time to pass through Namur in her way to Spa. On pretence of paying his respects to Margaret, he left Brussels, and arrived in Namur, with a great number of the nobility and others, who were favourable to his defign. But as the governor of the castle was a perfon of strict fidelity, Don John was obliged, in order to accomplish his aim, to have recourse to the following stratagem. Feigning to set out in the morning for the chace, he took his way by the castle; where having stopt, and enquiring for the governor, he pretended a curiofity to see the fortifications of the place. The governor, flattered with this visit, and suspecting nothing hostile from men who seemed equipped only for hunting, readily admitted, not only Don John himself, but his attendants: some of whom having arms concealed under their apparel, immediately seized upon the July 24th. gate ".

JOHN having thus secured possession of the castle, the town was, by the assistance of count Barlaimont, governor of the province, foon subjected to his authority. He observed with triumph, that the day on which this event happened, was the first day of his regency. It might with greater propriety have been faid, that it was the first of those calamities which pursued him to the grave.

AFTER fuch an open violation of his faith, there could be little room for any future negociation with the States. Yet, in a letter which he wrote to them on this occasion, he regretted that the plots which had been laid to deprive him of his life or liberty, had obliged him to have recourse Book to so hostile an expedient: and he affirmed, that he was still ready to observe the conditions of the perpetual edict; but declared that he would not quit his present situation, till they should make provision for the security of his person, against the machinations of his enemies.

^{*} Bentivoglio, lib. x. p. 192. 195. Meteren, p. 185.

1577.

THE States and council were greatly aftonished, The aftonishwhen they received intelligence of this event. States. They had wished for nothing so much as to preferve the provinces from being plunged afresh into the calamities of war. They considered that some of the principal cities in Brabant were in the hands of the Germans. They knew not what part these troops might act, if hostilities with the governor should take place; and they could not imagine that he would have ventured on so manifest a breach of the perpetual edict, without the prospect of some powerful support. They immediately dispatched ambassadors to remonstrate with him on the nature and consequences of his conduct, and to request him to return to Brussels. promised to make the most serious enquiry into the machinations of which he complained, defired that he would name the persons guilty, and assured him, that nothing should be wanting on their part to provide, in the most satisfactory manner. for the fecurity of his person.

Or the reality of these machinations he could produce no other evidence, but some anonymous letters, which, he said, had been transmitted to him. But as no person was named in these letters, and the authors of them were utterly unknown, all men believed them to be a forgery of his own, or of his courtiers, deligned to serve as a pretext for his present treachery.

THE answer which he made to the States shewed clearly, that, in the step which he had taken, he had been influenced by a motive very different 1577.

Book from that which he pretended—That the States should put him in full possession of the authority, which the preceding governors had exercised; that they should give him the entire command of the army; break off all communication with the prince of Orange, and the provinces of Holland and Zealand, and compel them to accede to the perpetual edict. These were some of the conditions, to which if they did not agree, he acquainted them, that he was unalterably determined not to return. The States represented the inconsistency between the former of the federands, and the perpetual edict; and reminded him of the utter impossibility, under which they found themselves, of complying with the latter, without violating their faith, which they had pledged, in the pacification of Ghent, to the maritime provinces. He still persisted in his resolution; and the States were equally inflexible.

Discovery of his deligns.

THEY were confirmed in their purpose, by some letters writ by Don John and Escovedo to the king, and Antonio Perez his fecretary, which were intercepted in Gascony by the king of Navarre, and fent by him to the prince of Orange, who transmitted them to the States. In these letters, the necessity of the speed return of the Italian and Spanish troops were urged with the utmost earneftness and importunity. The diseases of the Netherlands, said Don John, admit of no other cure. but lopping off the parts affected: and, to the same purpose, Escovedo observed, That fire, and the shedding of blood, were the only means by which the disorders that prevailed could be remedied. For no man here, faid he, whether among the nobility or people, performs the duty that he owes either to God or the king. Opinions the most abominable univerfally prevail; and every man lives as he lifts, without law or rule. To which he added, That if the king did not fend the neceffary troops and money foon, he was afraid that Don John, who could not endure his present fituation.

ation, would quit the Netherlands, and try his Book fortune elsewhere.

1577-

WHILE these letters served to alienate the Flemings more than ever from Don John, they raised to The States the greatest height their admiration of the pene-of towns into tration and fagacity of the prince of Orange, who their patterhad given them early warning of the governor's fion. duplicity, and whose predictions were now so remarkably fulfilled. They entered with greater ardour than ever into his views, and in conformity with his advice, they resolved to lose no more time in negociating, but without delay to put the provinces into a posture of defence, before the return of the Spanish forces. Whilst their levies, and other military preparations, were going on, they laboured with great folicitude to perfuade the Germans to deliver up the towns in their possession. Their success was in some measure retarded by the governor's intrigues with the officers; but the States, having at this time greater facility than Don John, in employing either money or force, according as the one or the other was most likely to prove effectual, had greater influence with the foldiers; who not only refused to listen to their officers, but put some of them under arrest, and gave them up to the States, together with the towns and citadels. In this manner the States recovered Bergen-op-zoom, Tolen, Breda, Boisle-duc, and feveral other places; and they had the good fortune likewise to defeat a body of Germans, in the governor's interest, who were upon their march to surprise the citadel of Antwerp. After which, prompted partly by the apprehensions which this attempt, though unsuccessful, had excited, and partly by the remembrance of the many calamities which the citadels, in other places as well as Antwerp, had occasioned to the inhabitants, they resolved to demolish these fortresles; and gave orders for this purpole, which were executed by the people with inexpressible alacrity.

[•] Meteren, p. 187. Bentivoglio, tom. ii. p. 2120 gittzed by Google

HISTORY OF THE REIGN OF Book XIV.

1577-

30

DON JOHN, in the mean time, endeavoured to make himself master of some places in the neighbourhood of Namur; and he succeeded in his attempts upon Marienburg and Charlemont. But, being for saken by the duke of Arschot, and almost all the other nobility who had attended him to Namur; and perceiving that the States were much fartheradvanced than himself in their military preparations, he fent them word that he had solicited the king for liberty to leave the Netherlands; and would immediately retire to Luxemburg, to wait the issue of his application, provided the States would agree to delift from hostilities till the king's instructions should arrive. But the States, sufpecting from their former experience that he intended nothing by this proposal but to render them more remiss in their preparations, gave him for answer, that before they would litten to any terms of accommodation, he must deliver up the To this Don John recity and castle of Namur. fused to consent; and thus the negociation was broken off, and all hopes of terminating the difpute amicably were extinguished P.

The States invite the prince of Orange to refide at Bruffels.

THE States, confidering war now as unavoidable, resolved to invite the prince of Orange to reside at Brussels; and accordingly five of their number were appointed to carry him an invitation, couched in terms to flattering and respectful, and fo expressive at the same time of their gratitude for his former fervices, that it was impossible he could hesitate to comply with their request. Having obtained the consent of the States of Holland and Zealand, he went first to Breda, and thence to Antwerp and Brussels. His reception in the places through which he passed, was such as might be expected from a people, by whom he was held in the highest respect and veneration. behold him, after an absence of several years, during which he had undergone so many labours, and been exposed to so many dangers in their service, they poured out in multitudes, to the distance of several miles, to meet him. In his passage from Antwerp

His reception.

P Bentivoglio, p. 198.

Antwerp to Brussels, one side of the canal was Book XIV. lined by the inhabitants of the former of these. places, and the other, by those of the latter; while the banks resounded with the joyful shouts of a grateful people, who faluted him with the glorious appellations of the Father of his Country, and the Guardian of its Liberty and Laws. Nor were these demonstrations of joy confined to the vulgar, who are always fincere, but often precipitate and inconstant in their applauses; persons of all ranks vied with each other in testifying their respect and gratitude; and immediately after his arrival, the States of Brabant and the States-general concurred in electing him governor of the province of Brabant 4; a dignity which had been hitherto bestowed only on the viceroys, or governors-general of the Netherlands.

By his wisdom and moderation, as well as by The promis-his vigilance and industry, William fulfilled the of the Nemost sanguine expectations of his countrymen. therlands. But, notwithstanding his address and prudence, and skill in managing the minds of men; qualifications which he possessed in the most eminent degree; he could not preserve that unanimity among the Flemings, which it was of so much consequence for them, in the present juncture, to At no period had they enjoyed so fair a prospect of securing their liberty on a firm and permanent foundation. Besides the advantage of having a person of so great experience and abilities to guide their counsels, the Spanish troops were entirely withdrawn; the king's finances were greatly exhausted with the wars in which he had been continually engaged; almost all the fortified places were in the hands of the States; and the people were animated universally with the most violent abhorrence of the Spanish government. But the States were prevented from improving the opportunity which this fortunate concurrence of circumstances afforded them, by a spirit of division and animolity, which sprung up, partly from the jealousies of the nobility, and partly from the intemperate religious zeal and bigotry of the people.

Book 1577.

Sources of

PHILIP de Croy duke of Arschot, the marquis anumonity and discord, of Havrée his brother, the count de Lalain, and feveral others of the catholic nobility, had, fince the death of Requesens, distinguished themselves as strenuous affertors of the liberties of their country. They had promoted with all their influence the pacification of Ghent, and had concurred with their countrymen in the invitation given to the prince of Orange to refide at Brussels. But when they reflected upon the extraordinary marks of attachment which William had received, and faw him vested with an authority and dignity in Brabant, which only the fovereign or his viceroys had hitherto enjoyed; above all, when they contemplated his great abilities and experience in the conduct of affairs; they foresaw that they must content themselves with acting a subordinate part in the government, and that the States would, in every branch of administration, be directed by the prince of Orange, who must therefore reap the glory of whatever should be atchieved, and, without the name of fovereign, exercise a supreme and fovereign authority. Stung with envy, and desirous to conceal the motive of their conduct, they began to affect an extreme anxiety at the danger to which the catholic faith was exposed, by the States reposing such unreserved confidence in one who was an avowed friend of the new religion. On this pretence, which never received any colour from the prince's conduct, they formed themselves into a confederacy, with a delign to counteract him. And in order to give their party confistency, weight, and influence, they resolved to invite the archduke Matthias, brother of the emperor, to take upon him the government of the provinces.

The Flemish This resolution they not only formed, but exnobles give an invitation ecuted, without the knowledge or authority of the to Matthias. States.

States. They dispatched a messenger to Matthias Book with the greatest secrecy, and intreated him to leave Vienna without delay.

1577-

Nothing could exceed the temerity of those who gave this invitation, but the imprudence of Matthias in accepting it. For besides, that he was called only by the least powerful of the two parties into which the Flemings were divided, he could not be ignorant how injurious and affronting his conduct must be thought by his kinsman the king of Spain. It is some alleviation of his folly, that he was only twenty-two years of age; and that, confidering the numerous progeny which his father had left behind him, there was little probability of his obtaining any fettlement in Germany, fuitable to his rank. At the time of the death of Requesens. he had made an offer of his service to the States, and he accepted greedily of the present invitation. His enterprise being of such a nature that he durst not discover it to the emperor, he set out from Vienna in the middle of the night, with a small number of attendants. No fooner was his brother apprifed of his delign, than messengers were dispatched to bring him back, and letters fent to the princes whose States he must pass through, intreating them to stop him; but Matthias travelled faster than the messengers, and, in a few days, reach-Hisarrival. ed the town of Lierras in Brabant.

THE States, astonished at the news of his arri-He is admitval, and highly incensed against those who had in-ted governor by the vited him, complained loudly of the infult offered States. to their authority; and would have instantly formed the resolution of rejecting him, had they not been diffuaded from it by the prince of Orange. William forelaw the advantages which might arise from that rivalship, into which Matthias had entered with his kiniman Don John, and from the feeds of enmity which were thereby fown between the German and Spanish branches of the house of Austria. He reckoned it rather fortunate, that Vol. II. D Don

B o o k Don John had received so unpardonable an offence from the catholic nobility; and he confidered how fatal to the general interest of the provinces all di-1577. vision must necessarily prove, in the present critical conjuncture of their affairs.

> INFLUENCED by these considerations, he exhorted the States to overlook the injurious treatment which they had received, and persuaded them to agree, not only to receive Matthias with all the respect due to his high rank, but even to elect him governor, on such conditions as they should judge proper to require. This conduct, the most prudent that could have been adopted in the present circumstances, furnished no fort of triumph to the duke d'Arschot, and the other catholic nobility. On the contrary, it mortified them exceedingly. to observe that Matthias owed his election not to them, but to the prince of Orange; whose authority, which they intended to have controlled, was now confiderably augmented, and more firmly established than before.

Mortificamobility.

Soon after this, they received a still more sentions of the fible mortification. The duke d'Arschot having lately been appointed governor of Flanders, had fet out for the city of Ghent, to take possession of his government. Not long after his arrival, a deputation of the inhabitants having urged him with much importunity to reinstate them in their ancient privileges, of which they had been deprived, in the time of Charles V. he was heard to declare. that that feditious multitude, which made so much noise about their privileges, should ere long be punished as they deserved, notwithstanding their being supported by the prince of Orange. faying being repeated by some who heard it, and circulated all over the city, inflamed the minds of the people with rage and indignation. to arms, furrounded the governor's house, and threw him, and his friends and attendants, into prison. The prince of Orange, dreading the confequences of fo violent a procedure, and believing Book the duke to be now fufficiently humbled, interceded with the Ghentele, and procured his liberty; but no folicitations could induce them to release his adherents. In this manner was the duke d'Arfchot's importance in the Netherlands almost annihilated. Marthias perceiving this, faw it to be his interest to connect himself with the party of which the prince of Orange was the head; and readily accepted the government, with a condition to which the States required his confent, that the prince should be his lieutenant general in all the branches of administration.

Digitized by Goleguences

PHILIP II. KING OF SPAIN.

MATTHIAS made his joyful entry into Bruffels, in the beginning of the year one thousand five hundred and seventy-eight, when both he and the prince of Orange were admitted to their respective offices, after taking an oath to maintain the laws, and to regulate their conduct according to the instructions which should be given by the States'.

DON JOHN fent an ambailador to protest in his application name against these proceedings. But the States of the States had some weeks before this time declared him an enemy to the Netherlands, and paid no regard to his proteflation. As they were perfuaded, however, that they had done nothing but what was authorifed by the fundamental laws of the conftirution, they wrote an account of their proceedings to the king, declaring that they still held their allegiance to him inviolable; and praying, that he would confirm their election of his kintman Matthias, as the most likely means of restoring tran-quillity to the provinces. They had very little reafon to expect that Philip would liften to this request. He looked upon their conduct in a light extremely different from that in which they themfelves regarded it; and confidered their prefumption in rejecting the governor whom he had ap-D 2 pointed,

Meteren, p. 196. 203

Digitized by CTO(

HISTORY OF THE REIGN OF

1578.

36

Book pointed, and still more that of nominating another , without his consent, as an act of the most audacious rebellion. The States were too well acquainted with his character, not to entertain some apprehensions that such might be his sentiments; and therefore, while they omitted nothing in their power to assuage his resentment, they endeavoured to fecure themselves against the effects of it, by interesting the neighbouring powers in their behalf, and by establishing unanimity between the religious parties into which the provinces were divided.

> In order to accomplish this last and most important object, a new treaty of union was concluded, in which, besides confirming the pacification of Ghent, the catholics and protestants promised mutually to support each other; and engaged, that they would join together in opposing all perfecution, on account of religion, from whatever quarter it should come .

The emperdr.

THE neighbouring powers were not unconcerned spectators of these transactions. The emperor faw with much anxiety, that those flames which had burnt fo long in the Netherlands, were now likely to burst out with greater violence than ever. But having been educated at the court of Madrid under Philip, with whom he wished to live on amicable terms, he had shewn himself exceedingly displeased with the conduct of Matthias; had given Philip entire satisfaction with regard to his own intentions; and had resolved to take no other part in the diffensions of the Netherlands, but that of employing his intercession and advice. not however oppose the levies which the count Palatine was making for the service of the States. either because he knew that his prohibition would not have been regarded, or because he defired to preserve a strict neutrality between the contending parties.

HENRY

HENRY III. of France was too much occupied Book in his own dominions, to have leifure to enter deep- XIV. ly into the affairs of the Netherlands. For many ages, France had seen no king of whose reign the Henry IIL of people entertained more sanguine expectations. France. Having, in his early youth, been appointed commander in chief by his brother Charles, he had given fignal proof of uncommon abilities. The French nation had flattered themselves with the hopes of feeing their kingdom restored by him to its ancient splendor; his fame was universally diffused; and the Polish nobility had, with general applause, conferred upon him their elective crown. But when, upon his brother's death, he left Poland, and succeeded to the crown of France, it is inconceivable how great a change he seemed to have undergone. Irrefolute, inconstant, indolent, and voluptuous, with a mixture of the most ridiculous superstition, he lost the confidence of the catholics as well as proteilants, whom he favoured and betrayed by turns. The unfleady and unskilful hand, with which he held the reins of government, added daily new force to the virulence of faction, till every member of the state, and almost every individual in the kingdom was infected. The queen-mother employed all her art and influence to support his authority, but could The States not restrain her younger son, the duke of Alencon, to the duke now duke of Anjou, from putting himself at the of Anjou.

Digitized by Google

could happen; fince he would be thereby deliver-head, fometimes of one party, and fometimes of another, in opposition to the king. To this prince, who was now the prefumptive heir of the crown, the Flemings addressed themselves, after having in vain applied to the king himself for protection. Anjou listened with much pleasure to their application; and having conceived hopes of obtaining the fovereignty of the provinces, he made them the most flattering promises of assistance. Henry, far from opposing the duke's designs, considered his leaving France as the most fortunate event that Book ed from a great number of restless intriguing spirits, by whom the tranquillity of his kingdom had been disturbed. But as he declined on this occafion to assist his brother in levying forces, partly from inability, and partly from the dread of embroiling himself with Philip, Anjou was not in a condition, till some time after the present period, to fulfil his engagements.

They receive affiftance from Elizabeth.

THE Flemings mean-while received the most seasonable assistance from the queen of England. Don John had, fome months before, endeavoured to preposses Elizabeth in bis favour; by reprefenting, that the disturbances in the Netherlands were entirely owing to the prince of Orange, and his adherents, who had broken the pacification of Ghent, and by their intrigues prevailed upon the States to violate the perpetual edict. Elizabeth pretended to give credit to this representation, and ordered her ambassador to reproach the States with their infidelity, and even to threaten them with her refentment, in case they should refuse to adhere to their engagements. Thus far this artful princess went, in order to persuade Philip that she feriously desired his subjects in the Netherlands to maintain their allegiance. But in reality the wifhed for nothing less. In a political light (that light in which the conduct of Elizabeth ought almost always be considered) nothing could be more defirable to her, than that the troubles of the Low Countries should continue; and, if either of the two contending parties should finally prevail, that victory should fall rather on the side of the people, than of the king. But when she considered the inequality of the dispute between him and the Flemings, she dreaded that the latter, if left to themselves, must soon be compelled, either to relinquish their pretensions, or to throw themselves for protection into the arms of France. therefore resolved to watch carefully over their conduct, conduct, and to afford them, from time to time, Book fuch affistance as their circumstances should require. She lent a favourable ear to the defence which was made by the prince of Orange and the States against Don John's accusation; and she admitted of their justification the more willingly, as in the representation given her of Don John's conduct on this occasion, she found reason to believe that his intentions were no less hostile with regard to herself, than with respect to the States and the prince of Orange. For William had taken particular care to inform her of some intercepted letters of Don John's, from which it appeared, that he entertained a fecret correspondence with the queen of Scots; that he had formed a plan, to which the pope was privy, for fetting that princess at liberty; and that he was incited to attempt this, not only by the defire of distressing Elizabeth, but likewise by the wild ambition of marrying the Scottish queen, and attaining, through her, possession of the British crowns.

1578.

AFTER this discovery, Elizabeth resolved no longer to keep any measures with Don John, but to exert herfelf with vigour in opposing his re-admission into the government of the Netherlands. With this intention she gave the most gracious reception to the marquis d'Havrée, the ambassador of the States, and entered readily into a treaty, by which she engaged to furnish them with an immediate supply, both of money and troops; upon condition, that the commander of their troops should be admitted into the council of state; and that, during the continuance of the war, no step should be taken, nor any alliance formed, without her content ".

ELIZABETH had no sooner subscribed this treaty, than being still desirous to avoid an open breach Meteren, p. 197. Bentivoglio, p. 202. Camden, anno 1577, &c. Digitized by Google

HISTORY OF THE REIGN OF

40

Book breach with Philip, she dispatched an ambassador to Madrid, to represent to him, that in her late transaction with the States, it was far from her intention to encourage them to withdraw their allegiance; that, on the contrary, she had employed the only means likely to prove effectual to prevent them from casting themselves in despair into the hands of some other power. She was deeply interested, she acknowledged, in saving her neighbours from oppression; especially the Flemings, with whom the commercial interests of her subjects had long been, and still were so closely connected. This she hoped would plead her excuse for exhorting him to substitute in the room of his brother a governor, in whom the people could repose greater trust and confidence; and with whom The herself could maintain a more friendly intercourse, than she could ever hold with Don John, after having discovered his design to invade her dominions. She concluded with intreating him to redress the grievances of his Flemish subjects; offering to mediate between him and them, if her mediation could be of use; and declaring, that if they should refuse to fulfil their late engagements, or attempt to make any innovation contrary to the pacification of Ghent, she would assist him in reducing them to obedience by force of arms *.

> ELIZABETH could not mean any thing by this embassy, but the fulfilling of an empty ceremonial, which was received by Philip, and performed by her with equal infincerity. She did not wait for a return to her embassy, but proceeded instantly to carry into execution her treaty with the States. Both the troops and money which she engaged to furnish, were immediately sent over; and the latter was remitted by the States to prince Casimire, to enable him to complete his levies.

> > \mathbf{T}_{HE}

Thomas Wilkes, clerk of the council. Carte, book xviii. Camden.

THE States had collected a confiderable body B o o E of forces, which they stationed in the neighbourhood of Namur; and if they had followed the counsel of the prince of Orange, who exhorted Imprudent them to lay siege to that important fortress, they states might have made themselves masters of it, and prevented the return of the Spanish troops. But many among them were still unshaken in their allegiance to the king, as well as in their attachment to the popish faith; whom nothing but their remembrance of the cruelties of Alva, and the late enormities of the Spanish troops, could have induced to concur in the measures which the majority had adopted. These men fondly imagined that Philip would be moved with their calamities. and persuaded to comply with their requests. Being for this reason unwilling to begin hostilities, they urged strongly the expediency of a defensive war: and thus the army was suffered, for several months, to remain inactive, and time imprudently given for the arrival of the Italian and Spanish troops y.

ALTHOUGH Philip did not entirely approve of The return his brother's conduct, and defired to have obtained of the Spahis ends by negociation and artifice; yet, having failed in this way, he resolved, without hesitation, to employ force; and he had accordingly fent orders to Alexander Farnese, the prince of Parma, to lead back the troops from Italy, to the Netherlands, without delay. On their arrival at Namur, being joined by other troops, which Don John had levied in the neighbouring provinces, they composed an army of fifteen thousand foot and two thousand horse; while that of the States amounted only to ten thousand foot and one thousand five hundred horse; and was no less inferior to the enemy in discipline, than in number. The States now

Meteren, book viii. ab initio.

Don John was at this time in a situation much

Battle of Gemblours.

Book now faw their folly in having neglected to make themselves masters of Namur, as an entrance had thereby been secured for the Spaniards into the centre of the Netherlands.

more fuitable to the talents which he possessed, than those negociations and treaties in which he had been hitherto engaged. He had longed with extreme impatience for the arrival of the forces, and ardently defired to be revenged upon the States for the injurious treatment which he imagined he had Having got information that their army, commanded by the Sieur de Goignies, had left their camp in the neighbourhood of Namur, and were retiring towards Brussels, he resolved to attack them on their march. With this intention he fent his cavalry before, under the prince of Parma, and followed them himself, as quickly as possible, with the foot. Farnese executed the trust committed to him with great valour. At the head of his battalion he attacked the Flemish cavalry with uncommon fury, and though they gave him a spirited reception, he soon compelled them to retire. In the mean time Don John came forward with a chosen body of infantry, and afforded him fuch a powerful support, as enabled him to drive the enemy's horse before him, till he entered along with them into the ranks of their main army. The Flemings believing the whole Spanish forces to be at hand, and being utterly unprepared for fo fudden an attack, were foon thrown into confusion and dispersed. About three thousand were killed, and a great number, with the commander

January 31st of the conquerors was inconsiderable.

AFTER this victory Don John reduced Gemblours, Louvain, Sichem, Nivelle, and several other places, both in Brabant and Hainault. He desired likewise to have laid siege to Brussels; but his council of war were of opinion, that his strength chief, were taken prisoners. The loss on the side was not adequate to so great an enterprise, and Book thought it more expedient to aim at easier con- XIV. quests, till his army should be reinforced.

THE States in the mean time received an abun-Amsterdam dant compensation for their losses in the southern accedes to the confederation provinces, by the acquisition of Amsterdam. To racy. this wealthy city, which even at the present period February8th was the greatest in the northern provinces, the duke of Alva had, as mentioned above, given the most particular attention; having expelled the protestants, and put the government entirely into the hands of rigid catholics. These men, supported by a numerous garrison, had baffled all the attempts which had been made by the States of Holland to reduce them. But being now hemmed in by their countrymen both by sea and land. and their trade almost ruined, they at last consented to accede to the pacification of Ghent, and agreed to disband the popish garrison, to recall the protestant exiles, and to allow them to hold their religious assemblies without the city. It was not long before they repented of these concessions. The protestants being inflamed with zeal for their religion; impatient under the restraints which in the late agreement had been laid upon them, fired with refentment for former injuries, and suspicious that the catholics were again meditating schemes for their expulsion, they flew to arms, and having suppressed the exercise of the popish faith, they drove all the priests, and others whom they sufpected of malignant designs, out of the city z.

In the midst of these transactions John de Noir-Philip's ancarmes, Baron de Selles, arrived from Spain, with States. Philip's answer to the application which the States had made to him fome months before. It was fuch as they had reason to expect, and contained an absolute denial of their requests, with regard to the removal of Don John, and the ratification of the election of Matthias.

CONVINCED

HISTORY OF THE REIGN OF

Book XIV. 1578.

The States profecute the war.

Convinced by this denial, of the folly of those hopes which they had entertained, that the king would yield to their entreaties, and sensible that they had fuffered confiderable loss, from that want of dispatch and secrecy which is incident to the procedure of a numerous affembly; they enlarged the powers of Matthias and the prince of Orange, and invested them, and the council of state, with authority to conduct the operations of the war, without having recourse on every occafion to the affembly of the States.

No time after this was unnecessarily lost. troops which had been dispersed at Gemblours were collected, and of these, and the new levies, an army was composed, amounting to eight thoufand foot and two thousand horse, partly Flemings, and partly Scots and English. This army was stationed in the neighbourhood of Lierres, in the centre of Brabant, under the command of the count de Bossut, Don John's army, after he had put garrisons into the towns which he had taken. was still superior in number; and therefore he refolved to march towards Bossut, before the auxiliaries, which the States expected from France and Germany, should arrive. But he foon found that he had now to contend both with troops and a general much superior to those whom he had en-Battle of Ri- countered at Gemblours. Boffut had, from a fense menant.

of Parma.

of the inferiority of his forces, pitched his camp near the village of Rimenant, in a fituation extremely advantageous for preventing the enemy from penetrating further into the provinces. the one fide it was defended by the Demer, and on the other, by a wood; and was fortified both before and behind with strong entrenchments. Notwithstanding this, Don John resolved to attack it, unless he could provoke the count to quit his The prince lines, and give him battle. The prince of Parma, who from his early youth was no less wife than brave, remonstrated against this resolution, as being

Digitized by GOOGLE

being dangerous and desperate. But Don John, Book being confirmed in his purpose by the other officers, gave orders for his army to advance, after having fent before a felect body of troops, to attack an important post, without the camp, which was guarded by some English and Scotch forces. under colonel Norris. Among the affailants was Don Alphonso Martinez de Leyva, at the head of a company of two thousand men, whom he maintained at his own expence, and who were all either gentlemen, or foldiers who had distinguished themselves in former wars. These men attacked the British troops with uncommon fury. After a short resistance, the latter began to retreat, but in good order, and with their faces turned towards the enemy. The Spaniards, to second whom Don John had fent several battalions of fresh troops, not suspecting any artifice, and believing the enemy to be intimidated, followed them with much precipitation, till they had past a narrow defile within reach of the artillery of the Flemish camp. Norris then returned to the charge, and the combat The Spawas renewed with greater fury than ever. He puifed by the was reinforced with troops fent him from the English, camp, and both parties, being nearly equal, feemed determined to die or conquer. This gallant Englishman animated his army by his own example, and had three horses killed under him. The Scots, impatient of the heat, fought in their August aft. shirts, and astonished the enemy with the singularity of their appearance. In the mean time, a body of troops, which had been placed in ambush, attacked the Spaniards in flank, and Bossut contimued to fire upon them incessantly with his artillery. They must all have perished, had not the prince of Parma obtained liberty from Don John to advance at the head of the cavalry to their relief. By his fuperior prudence, he would have prevented this inconsiderate enterprise; and now, by his prudence and bravery united, he faved the troops from those fatal consequences, to which through their own and the general's confidence, they had been exposed. About nine hundred men however fell on the field of battle, and a few more were taken prisoners .

HISTORY OF THE REIGN OF

Book 1578.

46

Don John, having thus failed in his attempt. and being fenfible that he could not, with his prefent army, keep the field against the numerous forces that were ready to pour in upon him from France and Germany retreated, with the resolution of acting for the future on the defensive only, and pitched his camp under the fortifications of Namur.

Treaty of the Anjou.

THE States concluded about this time their States with treaty with the duke of Anjou, which confifted of the following articles:—That, under the title of Protector of the Netherlands, the duke should furnish, at his own expence, ten thousand foot and two thousand horse: that all the conquests which he should make on the Flanders side of the Maese. should belong to the States; and those on the other fide to himself: that, for the accommodation of his troops, Landrecy, and Quesnoy in Hainault, and Eapaume in Artois, should be put in his possession: that the States should not enter into any agreement with Don John, without the duke's consent: and that in case they should hereafter think proper to elect another fovereign, they should make choice of the duke; but that in the mean time the government should remain entire in the hands of the States.

Deligns of the States.

AGREEABLY to the first article of this treaty, Anjou had affembled a confiderable body of troops in the neighbourhood of Mons, to which place the States fent a folemn embaffy to intreat that he would quicken his march into the interior provinces. They intended, that their own army should unite with his, and that of Casimire, and that Bentivoglio, book x. Strabo, I. iii. Meteren, p 225. Thuanus, lib. lxvi. fect. xii.

PHILIP II. KING OF SPAIN.

47 that all the three armies should act in concert Book 1578.

with one another, in expelling Don John, before XIV. he should receive a reinforcement from Spain or Italy. Nor was it without apparent reason that they entertained the hopes of accomplishing this design. Prince Casimire had passed the Rhine and the Maese, and advanced as far as the town of Diest in Brabant. His army, when joined Their nuwith that of the States, amounted nearly to forty merous army thousand foot and twenty thousand horse, and was greatly superior to any which Don John could muster to oppose it.

Bur a variety of causes concurred in rendering Its operatialmost useless these mighty preparations; and a ons rendered ineffectual. spirit of division arose, by which the people in the more fertile provinces lost for ever that liberty, for which they had so strenuously contended, at the very time when it was most in their power to fecure it on a firm and permanent foundation. For although, according to the testimony of the catholic, as well as the protestant historians, nothing could exceed the prudence and moderation with which the prince of Orange conducted the affairs of government, it soon appeared, that no human wildom was sufficient to preserve harmony and concord, where there were so many grounds of jealousy and discontent. Of this discontent and jealoufy, religious bigotry was the principal, but not the only cause. Ambition and interest joined their influence to that of religion, and not only divided the people themselves into factions, the most inveterate and hostile, but created suspicion and discord between them and the foreign powers which they had called to their affiftance.

THE queen of England had heard, with great uneafiness, of the late treaty between the States and the duke of Anjou. She knew not, at this time, how far Henry was concerned in his brother's enterprise, nor what schemes of conquest these two princes might have formed. She confidered by Google

1478.

Book fidered what great advantages their neighbourhood afforded them for the execution of their schemes: and forefaw the prejudice which might accrue to the English nation, if the Netherlands were to fall under subjection to the crown of France. order to prevent this, and counterbalance the power and influence of Anjou, she had made such ample remittances of money to prince Casimire, as had enabled him to augment the number of his army, which confifted wholly of protestants, confiderably above what the States had either expected or defired. This alarmed the jealousy of all the catholics in the Low Countries, who dreaded the approach of fo great an army of reformers, and fuspected that Casimire, in concert with Elizabeth. had conceived the design of extirpating the popish They did not conceal their apprehensions. Even the prince of Orange, and other moderate protestants, joined in remonstrating with Casimire on the necessity of his dismissing a part of his forces. But this remonstrance served only to alienate him from the prince of Orange and the council, and to render him less attentive to their instructions with regard to the conduct of the He was likewise highly offended with the preference which the States had given to the count of Bossut, by appointing him commander in chief of the army; and he made them feel his resentment, by the flowness of all his military operations, and his continual demands of supplies for the payment of his troops b.

Intemperate zeal and am-

Bur the intemperate zeal and ambition of the zeal and am-bition of the protestants was productive of still more pernicious Protestants. effects. Not satisfied with the security from perfecution which they had enjoyed fince the pacification of Ghent, they took courage from the great number of protestants in the army, and petitioned Matthias and the States, to be allowed to hold their religious affemblies openly in churches, and to be admitted, on the same footing with the the catholics, to the several offices of government. They ought certainly to have remained filent, as they had done hitherto, till the common enemy had been expelled, and the public tranquillity established. Yet their conduct admits of some apology; their party had greater influence now than it was likely to possess, if the catholics were delivered from their dread of the Spaniards, and they could not foresee those fatal consequences with which their application was afterwards attended.

Bur whatever judgment may be formed of their discretion, the States thought it necessary, lest the army should have proved refractory, to comply with their requelts. The pacification of Ghent required that religion should remain on the fame footing on which it stood at the time of that treaty, till the States of all the provinces should be affembled; yet the States, now partially affembled, confented, not only that the protestants should have accels to all public offices, but likewise that they should have churches allowed to them in every place where a hundred families refided; upon this condition, that in Holland and Zealand the same indulgence should be granted to the catholic inhabitants. To this decree they gave the name of the Peace of Religion; and each of the provinces was left at liberty to accept or reject it, as they should judge expedient.

In some cities it proved a falutary remedy for The unhapthe diforders with which they were diffracted; py contebut, in many others, it added malignity to that poison, which raged in the minds of the more violent religionists, and was the source of the most pernicious animofity and discord. It gave no contentment to the zealots of either party, but contributed to inflame them more than ever against each other, by adding fresh materials to that inveterate jealoufy and rancour which their bigotry inspired, but which had been laid asseep for tome time past, by their apprehensions of the Vol. II. common common danger. The catholics every where. but in a few cities of Flanders and Brabant, opposed the execution of this decree; and the reformers derived little advantage from it, except in those places where they overpowered their antagonists by superior numbers. In the provinces of Artois and Hainault, the people rejected the decree with the most determined obstinacy, and refused to allow the exercise of any other religion but the catholic within their territories; while the protestants in Ghent and other places, actuated by the same intolerant and bigoted spirit, expelled the popish ecclesiastics, seized their effects, and spoiled the churches of their ornaments.

Book

Difcord be-

BETWEEN the people of Ghent and the Walewen the loons a particular ground of enmity had subsisted, and Flemings ever fince the former had cast the duke d'Arschot and his attendants into prison. For most of these were persons of rank in the Walloon provinces; and the Ghentese had not only rejected every solicitation in their behalf, but had even treated them with severity during their confinement. Walloons were, for this reason, the more readily incensed by the accounts which they received of the late enormities committed against the catholics, which they justly regarded as a violation, on the part of the protestants, of their late engagements. Forgetful therefore of the danger which threatened them, and listening only to the voice of indignation and refentment, they began to separate themselves from the other provinces, and refused to contribute their share of the money necessary for the payment of the troops. "We took "arms," faid they, "to vindicate our liberty; " but what will it avail us to be delivered from "the Spanish yoke, if we must submit to a yoke " no leis galling and intolerable, imposed upon us "by our countrymen; who, under the pretext of of great zeal against the tyranny of the Spaniards, "Thew now that their only delign has been to " tyrannile

"tyrannise over us themselves." The other pro- Book vinces represented to them the mischievous consequences with which their conduct must be attended, and accompanied their representations with prayers and threats; but the Walloons remained inflexible, and soon afterwards they gave a striking proof of their hostile disposition, by refusing to deliver the towns of Landrecy, Queinois, and Bapaume, to the duke of Anjou, in conformity to the treaty above recorded. Not fatisfied with this, they began to prepare openly for war, and employed the contributions, which had been raised for paying the army of the States, in levying forces against the Flemings. The Flemings quickly armed themselves in their defence, and several rencounters happened between the Walloons and them, that were equally pernicious to both.

PRINCE Casimire's troops and those of the The effects States had been for some time past united, and of that dif-Don John was not possessed of a force sufficient to oppose them; but the factious and refractory foirit of the Walloons and Flemings had diffused itself into almost every part of the Netherlands, except the provinces of Holland and Zealand. Many cities withheld their contributions, and the army was extremely ill provided with every thing necessary to render the operations of the campaign effectual. Boffut's principal object was to compel the enemy to a general engagement; and for this purpose, after taking two or three towns of little consequence, he led his troops within view of the camp in which Don John had entrenched himself, under the fortifications of Namur. With an army fo much superior in number to the enemy, the count might have forced the entrenchments; but being neither furnished with pioncers, cannon, or a sufficient quantity of ammunition, and finding Don John unalterably determined to keep within his camp, he was obliged to retire. His troops, in the mean time, were highly difcontented, on account of their want of pay. His discipline Google

Book XIV. 1578. discipline was unavoidably relaxed. The country was oppressed and plundered. Casimire accepted of an invitation from the Ghentese, to assist them with a part of his forces against the Walloons. It became dangerous to keep the remainder of the army any longer in the neighbourhood of the Spanish camp, and it was soon afterwards found impracticable to support it. Apart of the troops therefore was disbanded, and the rest were put into garrison in the fortisted towns.

THE duke of Anjou's army was not better provided with the means of Sublistence than that of the States, and its operations were equally infignificant. Conscious of his inability to fulfil his engagements, Anjou grasped at those pretexts for eluding them, which the conduct of Casimire, and that of the Walloons, afforded him. He complained bitterly of the treatment which he received from the latter, who not only refused him admittance into the towns which the States had promifed for the accommodation of his troops, but shewed themselves no less unwilling to furnish him with provisions, than if he had come to invade, and not to protect and defend them. He seems likewise to have suspected, and not without some reason, that Casimire had formed some private designs, inconsistent with that establishment which he himfelf had in view in the fouthern provinces; and that he had carried his troops to the affittance of the people of Ghent, in order to pave the way for executing those designs. He therefore refused to join his army with that of Boffut, unless Casimire should return to it; and when Matthias and the prince of Orange failed in their endeavours to prevail on Casimire, (to whom the Ghentese had advanced a confiderable fum of money, to induce him to remain with them) Anjou broke up his camp, and fuffered a part of his army to go over to the Baron de Montigny, who was commander in chief at that time of the forces of the Walloons .

Such

XIV. 1578.

October.

chagrin which he conceived from the negligence with which his repeated applications for money and troops were treated by the Spanish ministers. Fond to excess of military glory, and conscious of talents which would probably have enfured fuccess, he lamented bitterly the necessity which the weakness of his army imposed upon him, of remaining fo long inactive, and folicited his brother for a reinforcement with the most earnest importunity. Nor was it only because Philip was averse from a vigorous profecution of the war, that he deferred complying with his request. After that renown, which Don John acquired in the battle of Lepanto, his conduct, as above related, contained fo clear a discovery of his views, as could not but alarm the fuspicious temper of the king, thenceforth kept a watchful eye upon all his brother's most fecret motions; and when he fent him to the Netherlands, resolved never to intrust him with fuch a numerous army as might enable him to execute any ambitious design. Philip's suspicions were, during his brother's residence in the Low Countries, kept perpetually awake, by reports of his having formed a design of marrying the queen of Scots. To these reports Philip gave credit, perhaps too easily. By his orders, Don John's favourite, and secretary Escovedo, who had fomented his master's ambition, were privately put to death. It was believed by many, that he issued the like orders with regard to his brother, and that this young heroic prince died of poison. given him by certain popish ecclesiastics, instigated by the court of Spain. But whatever ground there was for this pertuation, there is little room to doubt that, from jealoufy of his brother, more than any other cause, Philip withheld the supplies necessary for carrying on the war. And to this circumstance, the troops of the States were indebted for their prefervation from that ruin, to which their divisions had exposed them 4. THE

HISTORY

OF THE REIGN OF

PHILIP THE SECOND. KING OF SPAIN.

BOOK XV.

ON JOHN having on his death-bed ap- Book pointed the prince of Parma to succeed him, his choice was foon afterwards approved, and ratified by the king.

The prince

This young prince had on many occasions, governor. fince his arrival in the Netherlands, given proof ter. of consummate prudence and the most intrepid valour. Temperate, vigilant, and indefatigable, he could descend to the most minute detail in all military operations, and was always the first to expose himself to toil and danger, and the last to retire. Pliant in his manners, and infinuating in his address; he could speak most of the European languages, and accommodate himself to the soldiers of all the different nations of which the army was composed. He possessed a vigour of bodily constitution equal to that of his mind, joined with an elevated martial air and aspect, which served, in the time of battle, to fill the enemy with terror, and to inspire his own troops with courage and confidence of success.

E4.

Digitiz Hir Google

HISTORY OF THE REIGN OF Book xv.

56

He had no fooner performed the last offices to his friend and kiniman, than he applied himself affiduously to fulfil the duties of that important thation to which he was now advanced. the army of the States remained in the field, he was obliged, through the smallness of his numbers. to follow the same plan which his predecessor had purfued, and to keep his little army strongly fortified within their camp; but when, from the causes above explained, not only the army of the States, but likewise the Germans and French under Casunire and Anjou, were all either disbanded, or put into winter-quarters, Farnese, confidering this as the proper feason for action, refolved to undertake the fiege of some important place, by the acquisition of which he might encrease his resources for carrying on the war.

HE hesitated for some time, whether he should enter first upon the siege of Maestricht, or that of Antwerp. The benefit which he would have derived from the possession of the latter of these places, was greater than any which could arise from that of the former, as Antwerp was the principal feat of wealth and commerce in the Netherlands, and was fituated in the most advantageous manner for profecuting the conquest of the maritime provinces; but having weighed attentively the difficulties to be furmounted in the fiege of a place of so great extent and strength as Antwerp, he wisely resolved to begin with the siege of Maeftricht, in which he could engage with fewer forces, and a greater probability of fuccess.

In order to conceal his design from the States, he directed his march towards Antwerp, and had a sharp rencounter with a body of French and British forces, which were sent out to obstruct his approach. These he forced to retire under the fortifications of the city; immediately after which he ^{*} Bentivoglio, part ii. lib. i.

1579.

Book his operations were retarded. At length, however, when by perseverance and the power of fuperior numbers, his trenches were fufficiently advanced, he planted two batteries, one against the gate of Tongres, and the other against the curtain, between the gate of Hoxter and that of the Cross. While the batteries were played off with great success, the royalists pushed forward the trenches, and were ready to enter into the The breach at the gate of Tonfossé, or ditch. gres, was the first made practicable, and Farnese resolved to assault it with a select body of troops. drawn from the feveral nations of which his army was composed. By thus mingling them together, he enflamed their ardour and emulation; but they met with equal ardour on the part of their opponents, and, after an obstinate and bloody conflict, were obliged to retire.

Brave defence of Maestricht.

THE prince, believing that this first attempt had failed through the imallness of the breach. renewed the fire of his batteries with redoubled fury, and prepared for a second attack. In order to weaken the garrison by dividing it, he resolved to make an assault at each of the two breaches at the same time. His troops advanced, in the face of the enemy's cannon, with the most undaunted intrepidity. The belieged flood undifmayed till they approached, and nothing could exceed the fury with which both parties began the combat. Their fire-arms foon ceased to be of use to them: for they came immediately to close fight, in which they could employ only their pikes and fwords. In one of the breaches De Herle, and in the other Tappin, gave the most splendid proofs of capacity and valour. The affailants, enraged at meeting with fuch obstinate relistance from an enemy fo much inferior in number, exerted their utmost vigour to overpower them. The action was furious and desperate. The ruins of the wall, and the ground on both fides, were strewed with the dead and dying. Stones hurled down from Book the bulwarks, and artificial fires, which the befieged launched among the affailants, increased Those fires happened to lay hold the confusion. of the barrels of gun-powder which stood near for the use of the combatants. The explosion was terrible, and many on both sides perished by this fatal accident. The air resounded with cries, and shrieks, and groans. The earth was covered with mangled carcasses; yet those who survived still maintained their ground with the same unconquerable obstinacy as before, and, from the horrid frene which lay around them, seemed only to derive fresh rage and fury. The prince of Parma gave orders at last, with much reluctance, for founding a retreat. The resolution and fortitude of the besieged, he perceived, were not to be overcome. Even if he could have mounted the breach. and kept possession of it, this would not have availed him, as other fortifications had been raifed within, which rendered the town almost as impregnable as before.

Upon reviewing his troops, the prince found that many of his best officers had fallen, and that the regiments of Spanish veterans were extremely diminished. He soon completed his numbers by making draughts from the garrifons of the towns in his possession. But when he reflected on the character of the belieged, he perceived the necesfity of laying afide all thoughts of taking the town by storm, and resolved to content himself with the flower method of undermining the fortifications, employing for this purpose a prodigious number of pioneers, and taking effectual care in the mean time, to render it impossible for the belieged to receive any reinforcement or supplies.

THE States were not neglectful of the preser-The States vation of a place, where both the garrison and in-attempt in vain to rehabitants had shewn themselves so worthy of their lieve it. attention. Having some time before received the celebrated Google 1579· celebrated La Noue into their service, they had appointed him governor of Maestricht, and given him the charge of conducting thither the reinforcements which they intended for the relief of the besieged. Nothing was omitted by La Noue to fulfil their expectations; but so pernicious were the consequences of that spirit of discord, which still raged as furiously as ever, between the protestants and catholics, that, although the council of state, seconded by the prince of Orange, gave him all the affiftance in their power, he was never able to collect a force sufficient to execute his purpose. The situation therefore of the besieged was become extremely deplorable. The garrison, which in the beginning of the siege consisted of a thousand men, did not amount to more than four hundred, and the citizens and country people had fuffered a proportionable diminution. Their provisions began to fail, and their store of gun-powder was nearly exhausted.

THEIR distresses were much augmented towards the middle of June, by their loss of a ravelin, which had enabled them to give great annoyance to the enemy. To acquire possession of this ravelin had been the chief object of the prince of Parma's operations for several weeks; and, though he met with the most spirited resistance, he at length accomplished his design, and could, with a large cavalier which he constructed, overlook the walls, and scour the town with his guns, almost from the one end to the other. Still however the besieged, animated by the hopes of relief, resused to capitulate.

Maestricht taken by surprise.

But the siege was brought to a conclusion much fooner than either of the two contending parties had reason to expect. On the 29th of June, it was suspected by some Spanish soldiers, that the wonted vigilance of the garrison was relaxed. In order to know the truth with certainty, these men crept silently to the top of the rampart, and found Book that the defendants were not only few in number, but overpowered with fatigue and heat, and buried in sleep. Of this they carried information to the general; who without delay ordered fuch of his troops as were nearest, to ascend the rampart with as little noise as possible. They were immediately followed by all the rest of the army. garrison were thus suddenly overwhelmed, and almost all of them were put to the sword. inhabitants fought desperately; but they sunk at last under the superior force of the assailants, who spared neither sex nor age; and continued the flaughter, till of eight thousand citizens, only three hundred remained. De Herle escaped by disguising himself in the habit of a menial servant; and Farnese issued strict orders to spare the life of the valiant Tappin .

1579.

DURING the fiege of Maestricht, various po- The prince litical negociations were carried on by the opposite labours to parties. The prince of Orange had at this time quell the tuthe chief direction of all the measures that were Ghent. purfued by the States and council; Matthias having, from a consciousness of his own want of experience, left the entire administration in his hands. The diffensions between the Walloons and Flemings had from the beginning given him deep concern, and he had omitted nothing in his power to heal them. Among the Walloons he had little influence, by reason of their abhorrence of his religion, and the jealoufy which they had conceived of his designs. On the other hand, the Ghentese, who in that age, were noted for their turbulent and feditious spirit, had been wrought up by certain factious leaders to a degree of madness, and were long deaf to all the remonstrances which he could employ. St. Aldegond, whom he fent to deal with them, exerted, but in vain, all the address and eloquence for which he was so highly celebrated. The interpolition of Matthias and the States was equally ineffectual. Nor did they Book pay any greater regard to the representations and threats of Elizabeth, who sent over an ambassador 4 on purpose to persuade them. At length the prince of Orange went himself to treat with them. They had lately inveighed against him, with great feverity, for his moderation towards the catholics: and had suffered some of their preachers to arraign him on this account, as infincere in his religious profession. But, being flattered with that regard and confidence of which his present visit was expressive, they resumed their wonted affection to his person; and, after he had staid among them some weeks, they complied with the several requests which they had hitherto rejected. consented to make restitution of the goods of which they had plundered the popish ecclesiastics: permitted the re-establishment of the rites and ceremonies of the Romish church, forbad all abufive language, whether in the pulpit or in private assemblies, and engaged to yield a more prompt obedience for the future to the authority of the States °.

1579.

> IT foon however appeared, that nothing but William's personal influence had induced them to make these concessions. In a few months afterwards, being incited by the same factious leaders to whom they had formerly listened, they indulged themselves in the most unjustifiable excesses; they plundered the churches and monasteries, expelled the ecclefiaftics from the town. and seized their effects, which they distributed among the Germans, whom they had called to their assistance against the Walloons. These and other enormities occasioned the prince of Orange to visit the Ghentese a second time; when they made him an offer of the government of the province. He prudently declined accepting this offer; but having again employed all his influence to quash the present dissensions in the city, he succeeded fo far as to be able to compel Imbife the Book chief magistrate, together with his factious adherents, to leave the city. He likewise put the magistracy into the hands of the more moderate reformers, fet at liberty such of the Walloon nobilivy as were still in prison, and procured for the catholic inhabitants, liberty of private worship, and fecurity from moleftation f.

⁴ Mr. Davidson.

WILLIAM laboured with no less earnestness to assuage the resentment of the Walloons, who, although they had not been the first aggressors, persisted in their hostile disposition, with the most unconquerable obstinacy. By the artifices of Matthew de Moulard, bishop of Arras, the count de la Lain, the marquis de Roubais, and others of the nobility, who beheld with deep malignity William's unrivalled credit and authority, the people had conceived the most incurable suspicions, that, far from being actuated by a difinterested attachment to the civil or religious liberty of the provinces, he intended only his own exaltation, and was preparing to establish it upon the ruins of the catholic faith. They lent a deaf ear therefore to every plan of accommodation that was proposed, either by the prince himself, or by Matthias and the States; who, they knew, were entirely directed by his councils *.

THE prince of Parma was too fagacious not to The prince discern the advantage which this disposition of the gains over Walloons afforded him, for drawing them back the Walloons to their allegiance. Soon after the death of Don John of Austria, he had, for this purpose, begun a negociation with their leaders; upon which he had bestowed particular attention, in the midst of those military occupations in which the siege of Maestricht had engaged him. In order to frustrate his endeavours, the prince of Orange and the States remonstrated to the Walloons on the infidelity which would be justly imputed to them, if they should enter into any separate terms of agreement; and represented to them the danger to which they would thereby expose themselves, as well as the other provinces, of being again enthralled by the Spaniards. The Walloons could not entirely divest themselves of the scruples. which these remonstrances were calculated to excite; nor were they free from those apprehensions of the Spanish tyranny, by which the other provinces were fo much disquieted. They had not forgot the scenes of treachery and violence, of which they had been so often witnesses; and found it difficult to rely on the promises of those, whose infincerity they had so frequently experienced. On the other hand, their bigotry, joined with the inveterate jealoufy which the nobility entertained of the prince of Orange, formed an infurmountable obstacle against any agreement with the That hatred with which they had been Flemings. long actuated against the Spaniards, began to yield to a more implacable aversion against the protestants; and in this they were confirmed by the address of the bishop of Arras, and the other agents of the prince of Parma; whose proposals of accommodation they were now inclined to embrace, provided it could be done confistently with those solemn engagements, under which they had lately come to the other provinces. To these engagements, according to the fense in which they themselves understood them, they adhered with inflexible fidelity; and persisted to the last in requiring that all foreign troops should be immediately dismissed; that the pacification of Ghent should be fully executed; and that Philip should recognise their right to form alliances either within or without the Netherlands, in case of any infraction on his part of the articles of this pacification.

Digitized by Google

⁸ Reidanus, lib. ii. p. 29. f Grotius, lib. iii.

The Spanish and Italian troops feat cout of the

Or their feveral demands, there was none which the prince of Parma found it so difficult to digest. as that of fending away the foreign troops. Netherlands place, he knew, could not be supplied by the Digitized by Undisciplined undisciplined forces of the country; and he dread-Book ed that he should be obliged to abandon the plan which he had formed, for jubduing the maritime 1579. provinces. The king, to whom he applied for precife inftructions, was no less averse from this concession. But Philip, considering the recovery of the Walloons (the most warlike of all the inhabitants of the Netherlands) as a matter of the last importance; especially in the present juncture, when his exchequer was drained by the expence which he had incurred in the conquest of Portugal: and hoping, that by the indulgent measures which he had resolved to espouse in his treatment of the Walloons, he should be able ere long to obtain their content to whatever he should require of them, he fent orders to Farnese to hasten the conclusion of the treaty; and it was accordingly concluded on the following terms: That all foreign May 17th. troops in the service of the king, should leave the Netherlands in fix weeks, and never return thither without the consent of the Walloon provinces: that an army of national troops should be levied, to the payment of which the king might apply the fublidies to be granted by the States: that all perfons in public offices should take an oath to maintain the catholic religion: that all the privileges of the provinces should remain inviolate: and that the government should be preserved in the same form in which it had been left by the late emperor when he refigned his dominions h.

This treaty was figned, on the part of the provinces, only by the deputies of FrenchFlanders, Artois, and Hainault. The other provinces were not called, as Luxemburg had never concurred in any of the late transactions; and the greatest part of Limburg and Namur had already submitted to the king's authority.

The prince of Orange, no stranger to the secret Theunion of motives of the leading men among the Walloons, Utrecht. Vol. II. F having expedient: that reflitution shall be made of the Book effects which belong to the convents and churches, in all the provinces except those of Holland and Zealand; and in their, that pensions thall be appointed to the popish ecclesiastics, to be paid them wherefoever they relide.

- "THAT all frontier, and other towns, which the general and provincial States shall think proper to fortify, shall be fortified at the joint expence of the generality, and of the particular province in which they lie; but if the General States shall on any occasion think proper to build new forts, without the confent of the particular province in which they lie, the generality shall furnish the whole expence.
- "THAT all fortified towns shall be obliged to receive such garrisons as the generality shall appoint, on condition that the troops shall, besides their oath of allegiance to the General States, take a particular oath to the province and town in which they are stationed.
- "THAT the General States shall not conclude any peace or truce, nor undertake any war, nor impose any taxes, without the consent of the majority of all the provinces and towns of the union; and that on the other hand, no town or province shall enter into any alliance with any foreign prince or power, without consent of the generality.
- "THAT in case any prince or state shall incline to accede to this alliance, he may be admitted, with the confent of all the members of the confederacy.
- "THAT all the male inhabitants of the provinces, from the age of eighteen to that of fixty, shall, in a month after the publication of the prefent treaty, inscribe their names in a register to be laid before the General States at their first assembly, to affift them in judging what forces each province is able to furnish. "THX Google

HISTORY OF THE REIGN OF

B o o k xv.

68

"THAT in order to procure the money necesfary for the support of the forces, all the taxes shall be farmed out publicly, to those who shall make the highest offer; and lastly, that the said taxes shall be heightened or lowered according as the General States shall judge the exigencies of the confederacy to require."

This confederacy was not immediately attended with those advantages which it was designed and calculated to produce. It behoved the religious parties to experience, for some time longer, the mischievous effects of their intemperate zeal and bigotry, before they could live at peace. In several places, the people were still agitated by the most violent animosity against one another. In Bois-le-duc, the protestants and papists took arms, and coming to blows, had several hundreds of their number killed. Soon after this, the protestants, being seized with a sudden panic, abandoned the town to their enemies, who immediately submitted to the Spaniards.

Violence of the protestants. In Antwerp, where the protestant party was the most powerful, the people insulted the popsish ecclesiastics, when employed in one of the solemn processions of their religion; and in spite of Matthias and the prince of Orange, who interposed their authority to protect them, they obliged them to leave the city.

Count Egmont's attempt on Bruffels. These violences, which the reformers, impelled by their religious zeal, exercised in Antwerp and other places, served only more easily to reconcile the catholics to the Spanish government; and contributed not a little to make several of the nobility forsake the party of the States. Among these was count Egmont, son of the great, unfortunate count Egmont. This young nobleman had hitherto distinguished himself by his zeal against the Spaniards; but resolving now to make his peace with them, he attempted, with a regiment of Walloons, to render himself master of Brussels, in order to deliver it to Farnese; and he succeeded so far in Book his delign, as to get possession of one of the gates, and introduce his troops into the city. The citizens ran inftantly to arms; and, being joined by some regular forces in the service of the States, they quickly recovered the gate by a fingular stratagem. Having driven violently towards it, some waggons loaded with hay and straw, they set fire to these combustible materials, and the wind blowing the flame and smoke to wards count Egmont's soldiers. they were foon obliged to betake themselves to flight. The whole inhabitants had, in the mean time, got under arms, and Egmont, with the rest of his men, was shut up in the market place, hemmed in on every side, and without any profpect of deliverance. There they remained during that day and the night following; neither of the two parties being inclined to begin hostilities. The citizens meanwhile indulged their refentment, by reproaching the count with his treachery, in forfaking those who had taken arms to revenge his father's death; calling out to him, that only eleven years before, on the same day of the year, and in the very place where he then stood, his father had died a martyr for that cause, which be now wanted fo basely to betray. This bitter remembrance drew tears from the young man's eyes. ple were moved with that compatition for the fon, which they owed to the memory of the father, and confented to fuffer him and his troops to leave the town !.

1579.

During the course of these transactions, con- Conserences ferences for reconciling the Netherlands to Philip for peace at were held in the city of Cologn, at the request and under the mediation of the emperor, the pope, and the electors of Treves and Cologn. The pope fent thither Castagna, archbishop of Rossano, who afterwards attained the papal dignity, and assumed the name of Urban VII. The chief of the emperor's embaffy

70

1579.

Book embassy was count Scwartzenburg. Philip named the duke de Terra Nuova for his ambassador, and the duke d'Arschot was at the head of the deputies from the States. From this nomination of persons of so great eminence and distinction, superficial observers were apt to imagine, that the negociation committed to them could not fail to be brought to the defired conclusion. But this was not the judgment of persons of greater penetration. They . confidered, not only that the prince of Orange, and the other popular leaders, by whom the States were governed, had already gone too far to expect forgiveness from the unrelenting temper of the king; but that the opinions of the reformers were more widely diffused, and their zeal, if posfible, more ardent than ever. And as there was no reason to believe that they would ever be perfuaded to abandon their religion, so there was little ground to hope that Philip's bigotry would fuffer him to agree to any terms of peace, whilft they adhered to it. It was in reality this cause chiefly, by which the present negociation, as well as all preceding ones, was frustrated. Philip acted on this occasion with his usual duplicity, and gave private instructions to his ambassador, of a very different import from those which had been communicated to the emperor *. At first, he feemed willing to ratify the pacification of Ghent: and by one of the articles of that treaty, religion was to remain on its present footing, till a general affembly of the States should alter it. But in the course of the conferences it appeared, that the re-establishment of popery was a condition, without which he would agree to no accommodation. Neither would he consent to the convoking of the assembly of the States, nor to the ratifying of the election of Matthias; and he still insisted peremptorily, that all cities, forts, and military flores, should be immediately delivered into the hands of the prince of Parma. In a word, the terms terms offered on this occasion were, in every ma- Book terial article, the same with those which had been formerly rejected by the provinces of Holland and Zealand, when they stood alone, and unsupported by the other provinces; and therefore it is difficult to suppose that Philip could, from the beginning, have intended any thing by the present negociation, but to gratify the pope and emperor. at whose desire it was begun, 🗸

1579-

BEFORE the dissolution of this congress, how-milip atever, he humbled himself so far as to make pri-tempts to gainover the vate offers to the prince of Orange. These were, prince of the payment of his debts, the restitution of his Orange. estates, a compensation for the losses which he had fustained during the war, and the liberty of his fon the count of Buren, upon whom, if the prince himself should incline to retire into Germany, the king promised to bestow the government of Holland and Utrecht. These offers were made in Philip's name by count Scwartzenburg, who pledged his faith for the strict performance of them. William could not but be flattered with the testimony which was thus given, by an enemy fo great and powerful, of the dread that was entertained of his abilities. But being superior to the allurements of interest, he preferred the glory of faving from flavery a people who confided in his integrity, to all the advantages which he or his family could have derived from the favour or forgiveness "He would liften to no proposal," of the king. he said, "that related to himself only. He was conscious, that in all his conduct, he had been animated by a difinterested affection towards the public good; and no confideration would induce him to enter into any agreement, from which the States and people were excluded: but if their just claims were satisfied, he would not reject any terms for himself, which his conscience and honour would fuffer him to accept 1.

Soon

72

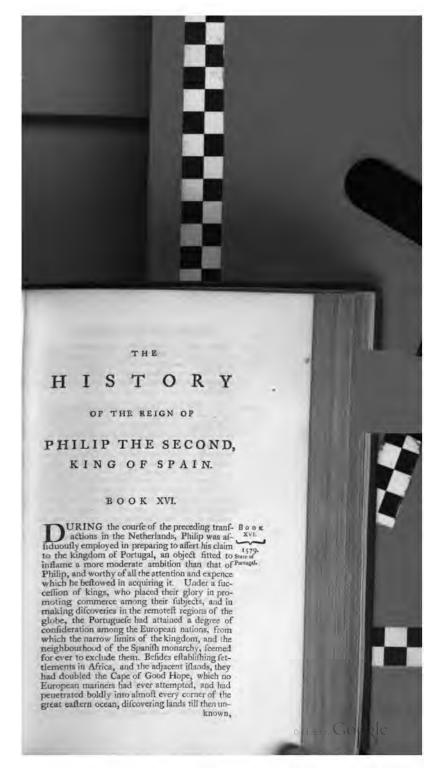

I 579. Diffolution of the con-

Book

Soon after this, the congress was dissolved; and no other effect was produced by it, except that the duke d'Arschot, and some other deputies of the States, embraced the opportunity, with which it furnished them, of reconciling themselves to the king.

The negociations for peace did not entirely interrupt the operations of the war. By the affiftance of the catholic inhabitants, the prince of Parma acquired possession of Mechlin; and some time afterwards of Villebrock. These losses were compensated to the States, by some acquisitions which their forces made under the count of Renneberg; who, besides reducing the province of Friesland, made himself master of Deventer and Groningen. In the southern provinces, the Flemings and Walloons were engaged in perpetual hostilities against one another, but no exploit was performed by either party, sufficiently interesting and important to deserve to be recorded.

THE

HISTORY OF THE REIGN OF

known, and founding cities, with a view to the advancement of their trade. And not fatisfied with their acquisitions in the east, they had turned their arms towards America, and planted in Brafil, that valuable colony, of which they still retain possession.

Don Sebaf-

74

JOHN the third, the last of those great kings under whose government the Portuguese performed fuch mighty atchievements, died several years before the present period, leaving his throne to Sebastian, his grandson, who was then only three This young prince gave early indications of many splendid accomplishments, which excited in the minds of the Portuguese the most fanguine hopes of a prosperous and happy reign; but unfortunately for himself, as well as for his people, he was animated with the most chimerical ambition, which led him not to imitate the example of his illustrious ancestors, by studying to promote the true happiness of his subjects, but prompted him to extend his dominions, in order to propagate the Romish faith.

His romantic ambition.

This passion was cherished in him by Don Alexis de Menezes, his governor, and Lewis de Camarra, a jesuit, his tutor or instructor; the former of whom was perpetually celebrating the praises of his predecessors, on account of their victories over the Moors in Africa and the Indies; while the latter impressed his young mind with a persuasion, that it was the first duty of a Christian king, and the most acceptable service which he could perform to the Deity, to extend the knowledge of the true religion. By these means, his ambition was inflamed to a degree of madness; and, in order to accomplish that design which appeared fo meritorious and honourable, he once refolved to fail with a fleet and army to India; nor could his courtiers perfuade him to relinquish that romantic project, till they proposed that, in place of of it, he should undertake an expedition against Book the Mahometans in Africa. From this enterprise likewise his wisest counsellors laboured with much folicitude to divert him; but their exhortations proved ineffectual. Sebastian adhered to his purpose with inflexible obstinacy, and exerted himself with great activity, in making preparations for carrying it into execution.

1579·

In the midst of these preparations an opportu-State of nity presented itself, which he considered as a de-Morocca. claration of Heaven in favour of his design. the death of Abdalla, king of Morocco, his fon, Muley Mahomet, had seized upon the crown, in contradiction to an established law of succession. that the kingdom shall devolve to the brother of the deceased king. A civil war ensued, and Mahomet, after having lost several pitched battles, was compelled to leave his uncle, Muley-Moluc, a prince of great abilities and virtues, in possession of the throne. After attempting in vain to engage Philip to espouse his cause, Mahomet applied to Sebastian, and offered, if he would reinstate him in his dominions, to put certain towns into his hands, and to become tributary to the crown of Portugal.

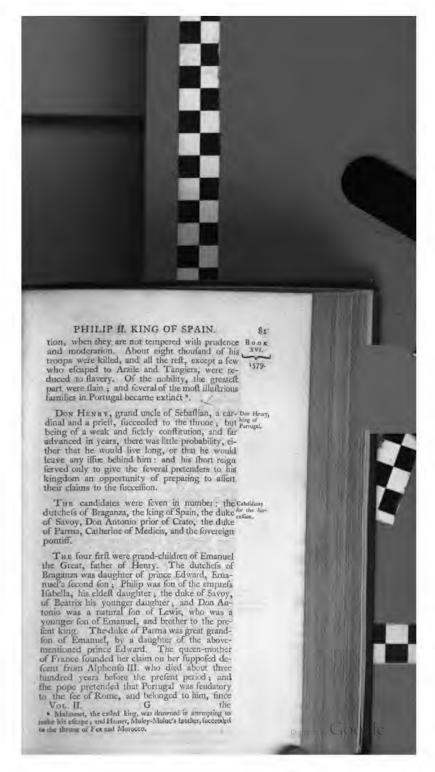

SEBASTIAN listened to these offers with the Sebastian reutmost pleasure, and readily engaged to pass over vade Mohimself to Africa with a fleet and army.

To enable him to fulfil this engagement, he solicited affiftance in troops from his uncle the king of Spain, from some Italian powers, and (which shews how anxious he was to insure success) from the prince of Orange.

In answer to the application which he made to Philip, that monarch proposed an interview with him, in the town of Guadaloupe in Castile. bastian agreed to this proposal; and the Spanish historians relate, that, in the interview which was PHILIP's agents at the court of Lisbon allowed. Book that if the dutchess of Braganza's father had been alive, his title would have been indisputable; but they maintained, that fince he had died without attain-Philip's title ing possession of the throne, nothing but the degree of confanguinity to Emanuel ought to be regarded: and that as the dutchess and he were equal in that respect, the preference was due to a male before a female. And they farther infifted, that the law which excludes strangers from inheriting the crown, was not applicable to bim, fince Portugal had formerly belonged to the kings of Castile.

Besides these considerations, which had very little weight, except with those who were for other reasons inclined to espouse Philip's interest, the duke de Ossuna, his ambassador, endeavoured to impress the scrupulous and timid mind of Henry with a perfualion, that, in opposition to so powerful a competitor as the king of Spain, it would be impossible for the duke of Braganza to maintain possession of the throne; and that the fruits of all the glorious discoveries and conquests which had been made by his father and brother would be loft, and the kingdom itself involved in the calamities of war.

HENRY's desire to prevent these unhappy con-Don Henry fequences, determined him to proceed with great claims of the deliberation in examining the pleas of the con-competitors. tending parties. He confulted civilians in different parts of Europe, and called a convention of the States of the kingdom, to give him their opinion with respect to the measures proper to be pursued. The members of the convention differed widely in their sentiments from each other, and while some of them advised him, without delay, to nominate for his successor which soever of the competitors he thought fit, others exhorted him deliberately to examine the feveral claims that had been offered. In compliance with this last advice the candidates were cited to appear;

> and Digitized by Google

G 2

HISTORY OF THE REIGN OF

liberationa.

84

Book and they all fent commissioners, who pleaded the cause of the princes whom they represented, before Henry, as they would have pleaded any or-Henry's de- dinary point of right before a civil judge.

> This extraordinary trial, in which fo great attention seemed to be paid to justice, was suited to the feeble and irresolute character, as well as to the habits of the king, who had spent his life in listening to the idle disputes of theologians. his conduct was feverely censured by all men of prudence and understanding. They considered that the fate of kingdoms can almost never be decided by the forms or principles of law; and they regarded this farcical trial, not only as useless for the purpose which was intended, but as calculated to divide the kingdom into factions, which must sooner or later produce a civil war.

His imprudence.

HE ought in the beginning, it was said, to have declared himself in favour of the dutchess of Braganza, whose right, according to the most common and obvious law of fuccession, was unquestionable; and who, befides, was much more acceptable to the nation, than any other of the candidates. He ought, after this, to have caused her right to be recognised by the convention of the States, who would cheerfully have confented to acknowledge it: he ought to have required an oath of allegiance to her, in the event of his own demise, from the army, and all persons in public offices; and then, instead of losing his valuable time in confulting and deliberating, he ought to have employed it, in putting the kingdom into a posture of defence against the king of Spain.

But Henry was incapable of forming any resolution that required fo much courage, vigour, and He was no less attached to the dutchess activity. of Braganza, and no less averse from Philip, than his nobility and people; yet he still continued to hesitate between them with as much deliberation as if he had expected to live for many years,

15-9.

In order to extricate himself from this perplex- Book ity, Henry began to think feriously of a proposal, which had been made to him by tome of his counfellors, to marry; and accordingly, notwithstanding his great age, his infilmities, and his having borne to long the character of a priest, he fent an ambaifador to folicit a diffeniation from the pope. There was little probability of his living to fairl his intention, and much lets of his leaving any inue behind him; vet Philip, being greatly alarmed at his delign, fent Ferdinand de Castello, a Dominican triar, to d'iluade him f.om it, by reminding him of the offence which his marriage would give to all true catholics, and the triumph it would afford to the Lutherans, and other lectaries of the age: and when Henry refused to admit Castello to an audience, a circumstance that furnished Philip with a stronger proof of Henry's alienation from him, than any which he had hitherto received, he employed all his interest at Rome, to prevent the pope from granting the dispensation.

In the mean time he spared no pains to conci-patters maliate the favour of the principal nobility; and mean having spread his emissaries over the kingdom, he published a manifesto, in vindication of his title, calling upon the people to turn their eves towards bim, as the only perion who would have a right to the throne after the decease of the prefent king. This manifesto, while it incented Henry more than ever against him, served in no degree the purpole for which it was deligned. The Portuguese entertained the thoughts of falling under the dominion of the Castilians with an hereditary and violent aversion; and there was nothing in the character of Philip by which their prejudice could be overcome.

IF Henry had availed himself of this disposition of his subjects, and acknowledged the dutables of Braganza for his fucceffor, almost the whole kingdom would have concurred to hippartal Google claim; and so great a force might have have pieniti.

would have either determined Philip to abandon his design, or have prevented him from carrying it into execution. But as the duke and dutchess of Braganza were deterred from exerting themselves, by their dread of Philip, and the weak irresolute conduct of the king; so Henry still flattered himself with the vain conceit, that Philip, as well as the other competitors, would submit to his decision.

Don Antonio declared illegitimate.

Towards his nephew, Henry acted with much less hesitation and reserve, than towards the other candidates. Having obtained a bull from the pope, empowering him to judge of Antonio's claim to legitimacy, he examined the witnesses whom Antonio produced to prove his mother's marriage; and, having extorted from two of them a confession of their having been suborned, while the other two contradicted each other in delivering their evidence, Henry, on this foundation, joined with the circumstance of the prior's being mentioned by his father in his latter will as his natural son, passed sentence, declaring him to be illegitimate.

Antonio had influence afterwards to persuade the pope to recall his bull, on the pretence of the king's having exceeded his powers. By this treatment Henry was highly exasperated both against the pope and Don Antonio; and he indulged his refentment against the latter, by banishing him first from the court, and afterwards from the kingdom. In obedience to this fentence, Antonio retired for some time into Castile; but he foon returned, and found, that his uncle's conduct towards him had not produced that effect upon the people which Henry had expected. attachment to the prior remained as strong as ever; and, as no pains were taken to form a party in the interest of the dutchess of Braganza, great numbers of the people were entirely devoted to him, and regarded him as their only refource against the tyranny of Spain.

FROM

PHILLIP IL EING OF SPERG

From the diputation of the project during the with the addition which farmer diplored in any meeting the meeter of the paramete, Frein perorned that he must not intelled beauty and one one many market a, and promising a process to the first Mindule, but it all earlies as agree to care to folia of arms. Agreedly to the military, to iffeed orders for earling owns to be a bound and Generally and the properties to the carquis de Senta Circe to ball the Lot is realised for action. He was reason to make a had to expect agent from From Burnary to Taren pean passers : with a water to the firm being alarmed, he care language he had gated, that, he was extend to the comment with the new time of Manager to the second makings or tel belone one waterspay exhibited restricts, specific Alexand. The period ferrod for purpose which be designed, and other the Edward France, the the page of Fagulant, and en Inser or Gennes proce, beside to resid to to creminate

En the remarking Home I had been and and an appropriate that he man was fell approaching. The present the man was not then one than one to have be been for the people to be been to be a man of the larger for the people to be been to be a most at Almeria, he been to the extend to be a the brokel distance to be a the brokel distance to be an of the larger for the certification of Browness, are story to be find the one or the other of their expectation and acceptable in the Street. For the certain of the advantage of the advantage of the certain of the advantage o 1580. Death of Henry, Jan. 318, 1580.

Воок

In the midst of their deliberations and disputes the king died, leaving the nomination of his successor to five persons, to whom he committed the regency of the kingdom.

THE first act of the administration of the regents was to send ambassadors to Philip, to dissuade him from having recourse to arms, till, according to the will of the late king, they should deliver their judgment concerning his right to the succession. But to this request, Philip, whose preparations were now complete, gave the following reply: "That his right was clear and indisputable; that he would not submit it either to the regents, or to the States, and that he did not desire to have any judgment whatever passed in confirmation of it."

By this answer the regents were thrown into great perplexity. A majority of them stood well affected towards Philip, but they were prevented from declaring in his favour, by their dread of the indignation of the people, and were obliged to iffue orders for equipping the fleet, and strengthening the fortifications and garrifons of the frontier But the great exertion which had been made lately by Sebastian, and the exhausted state to which the kingdom had been reduced, by the numberless expeditions to India and America, from which no fruit had been yet derived, fufficient to compensate either for the expence which they had cost, or the loss of men which they had occasioned, rendered it impossible for the regents, if they had been ever so much inclined, to secure the kingdom against so great a force as the Spanish monarch had prepared.

Philip's fleet His army, including four thousand pioneers, and army. amounted to thirty-five thousand men, and his fleet consisted of thirty men of war, seventeen frigates, and seventy gallies and ships of burden loaded with provisions and military stores. It was not

THILLIP IL ADDES OF TRACE

and that expenses in labour a little related by feeding distance, as Fernal as repetited period. This beatles die This way, beginned server, parties assert, miles it is improved, that he had been not in superhad that the French and Fragitive continuous

He gave the comment of she had to be now a plant that, One, also sat maked the shirt? smil office to finale. But he helicated for timethat with regard to the perfect whom he could phone the heat of his find loves. His below tion, however, and not proceed from any doubt which he entertained with regard to the monit and abilities of his generals. For the duke of Alva was will alive; whom Philip knew to be polleded of every qualification requifite to focure the fucceiof his inrended enterprite.

Any & upon his return from the Netherlands, sorname had been admitted by Philip to the fame degree of at Aire. layour and confidence which he had formerly enjoyed. But his fon, Don Garcia de Toledo, having delianched one of the maids of homeur, under a promife of marriage, Philip had put him under arrest, and given orders that he thould not be releafed fill he should confect to fulfil his engagement a porwithitanding which, his father had adulted him in making his citype, and, in order stfectually to difappoint the king's intention, fool concluded a marriage between him and the couling a daughter of the marquis of Village to employ their intercession in his behalf; but all his applications for forgiveness had hitherto been inessectual, and he had remained almost two years in confinement. This severity, exercised, for so small an offence, towards an old friend and servant, in the decline of life, was by some ascribed to Philip's imperious temper, and his implacable resentment; whilst others said, that he had been long disgusted with Alva's arrogance; and that the duke's conduct in the affair of his son, was only a pretence which Philip made use of, to justify himself for dismissing from his presence a man whose temper and manners were become intolerable.

Planter, highly provided with this contempt of bigging, but beauty the day byracing and perford him uphopathes! Thesis Abraham Digitized by Google

Book XVI.

To which soever of these motives Philip's treatment of Alva could be ascribed, it was expected, that neither his pride, nor his natural suspicion and distrust, would have suffered him to commit the charge of an enterprise of fo great importance as the prefent, to one towards whom he had shewn himself so inexorable; and it excited great surprife, when he fent two of his fecretaries to the duke, to inquire whether his health would permit him to undertake the command of the army which he had prepared for the conquest of Portugal. To this inquiry, Alva, without hefitation, replied, that he was ready to devote the little health and strength that were left him to the service of the king, and immediately afterwards he fet out for Barajas to receive his instructions. He defired liberty to pay his respects to Philip at But fo ungracious was this prince even towards fuch of his ministers as he esteemed the most, and so incapable of entirely forgiving any offence or injury, that he refused to grant him admittance into his presence; and, having transmitted his instructions to him at Barajas, he ordered him to join the army as foon as possible. who remembered the barbarous cruelty which Alva had exercised in the Netherlands, were not forry for the mortification which he fuffered on the prefent occasion; but they could not with hold the tribute of applause which was due to him, on ac- Book count of that inflexible fidelity so becoming in a subject towards his sovereign, which determined him, in the extremity of old age, to expose himfelf to all the hazards and hardships of war, in order to advance the interest of a prince by whom he had been treated so ungratefully.

Digitized by Google bute

XVI. 1580

FROM Barajas, Alva went, as foon as he had re-March of the ceived his instructions, to join the troops, which troops. were affembled at Badajox; and foon afterwards June 2582. he began his march towards Elvas and Olivença. These, and all the other towns which lie north from the Tagus, as far as Setubal, on the western coast, though extremely averse to the Spanish government, yet being utterly unprepared for relistance, opened their gates, and proclaimed Philip for their fovereign.

THE marquis de Santa Croce, who had fet fail with the fleet from Port St. Mary, near Cadiz, found the same facility in reducing Faro, Lagos, and other towns on the coast of Algarva and Antejo; and he came in fight of Setubal, in a few days after the arrival of the land forces at that place.

HITHERTO almost no blood had been shed, and Progress of neither the fleet nor army had met with any op-arms. position to retard their progress. The duke of Alva intended next to march without delay to the capital, but it was necessary, he thought, to proceed now with greater circumspection than before, as Don Antonio had drawn together a confiderable body of forces, had been admitted into Lisbon, where he was proclaimed king by the people, and had strengthened several of the towns and forts by which the Spanish army must pass in their approach to that city.

THREE ways of reaching Lisbon were proposed in a council of war that was held on this occasion.

HISTORY OF THE REIGN OF

92 Book XVI.

One of these was to cross the Tagus, some miles above the city, at the towns of Almerin and Santaren; another, to fend round the fleet to Almada, and to put the troops on board at that place, which lies almost directly opposite to Lisbon; and the third, to carry the army round by sea from Setubal to Cascaes. The two first of these ways were thought preferable to the last, by most of the officers, because they were safer; yet the last was embraced by the duke of Alva. He acknowledged the justness of what his officers advanced in support of their opinion, but he observed, that, as the fleet was at hand, the army could be immediately put on board; that the passage to Cascaes was not long, and that, as the enemy were ill prepared for their defence, his success would be greatly facilitated by the celerity of his approach.

ALVA was not disappointed in his expectation of the effect which his sudden arrival was calculated to produce upon the Portuguese. They were drawn up along the shore, as if they had intended to dispute his landing; but no sooner had the ships begun to fire upon them, than they retired, and fuffered him to land, and put his men in order, without giving him the smallest molestation. They might still have obstructed his approach to Cascaes, as his road thither lay over a hill, defended with a battery of cannon, and full of rugged rocks and brambles, of which Don Diego de Mencses, commander in chief of the Portuguese under Don Antonio, had taken possession with between three and four thousand men. Alva ordered the Spaniards to attack them, without being deterred. either by the strength of the ground, or the number of the enemy. An old experienced officer, of the name of Bariettos, an intimate friend of Alva's, asked him in a whisper, Whether his attempting, with fo little precaution, to diflodge an enemy to strongly situated, did not resemble the action of an ardent young warrior, rather than that of an experienced experienced general? Alva smiled, and replied, Book That a good general ought on some occasions to employ the prudence and circumspection of old age, and in others, the ardour and confidence of youth. The event shewed that his conduct, though apparently rash, was well adapted to the present circumstances. The Spaniards, inspired with their general's confidence, advanced boldly, and the Portuguese (almost all of whom were raw and undisciplined) retreated, without waiting for their approach.

Digitized by Google

ALVA laid fiege immediately afterwards to the town and castle of Cascaes, and by the briskness of his operations he foon compelled the garrifon to furrender. But on this occasion he sullied that renown which his wisdom and vigour would have procured him, by the cruelty which he exercised towards such of the Portuguese as had thrown themselves upon his mercy. In violation of his promise to Don Antonio de Castro, lord of Cascaes, who had joined him upon his first arrival in the kingdom, he gave up the town to be plundered by the Spaniards, and having fent all the foldiers in the garrison to the gallies, he put to death, without any form of trial, Don Diego de Meneses, a nobleman of an illustrious family, and one who, on account of his personal merit, was universally respected and beloved. To this barbarity Alva was prompted by private resentment against Meneses 4: although, it may be prefumed, that he would not have ventured to indulge it on the present occasion, if he had not known that his conduct was conformable to the fentiments of the king. It was calculated to inspire the Portuguese with terror, but it terved likewise more than ever to alienate their affections; and confidering how much superior the Spanish fleet and army were to any force which had been prepared to oppose them, it could not be coloured with the tyrant's ordinary plea of necessity.

FROM

HISTORY OF THE REIGN OF Book XVI. 3580.

94

From the town of Cascaes, Alva led his army against the forts of St. John and Belen, both which he foon reduced to the necessity of surrendering; and being seconded in his operations by the sleet, the example of these places was quickly followed by Almada, and almost all the other fortified places on both sides of the river.

During these transactions Don Antonio, after having, from a consciousness of the weakness of his party, essayed in vain to obtain advantageous terms from Philip, had pitched his camp, with all the forces which he could collect, on the east side of the river of Alcantara, on the road to Lisbon.

ALVA amused him for several days with the hopes of an accommodation, in order to afford time for the operation of a spirit of despondency that prevailed in Antonio's army. Meanwhile he omitted not to procure the most accurate information concerning the fituation and strength of his camp; and, on the 25th of August, he refolved to attack it. Before he could approach the entrenchments, it was necessary that he should make himself master of the bridge of Alcantara, or lead his army to a confiderable distance up the river, the banks of which were so steep and rugged, as rendered it impossible to transport either horse or foot in fight of the enemy. Having drawn up his main army in order of battle, directly opposite to the Portuguese camp, he sent the horse under his son Ferdinand de Toledo, and two thousand select infantry, under Sancio d'Avila, to cross the river several miles higher, where the banks were practicable, whilft he ordered Colonna, with the Italians, to make an affault upon the bridge.

COLONNA's troops were twice repulsed, but in the third onset, being supported by a body of Germans, which the duke sent to their assistance, they Book confiderable than the town itself to be ransacked and plundered, without making any distinction between the friends and enemies of the king. He suffered them likewise to pillage the houses of fuch of the inhabitants within the town as had difcovered any attachment to Don Antonio, and he allowed parties to go out and plunder all the country and villages in the neighbourhood. Spanish historian says, that the soldiers committed these enormities without the duke's permission, yet no punishment was ever inflicted on them, and no restitution was ever made to the many thousand innocent persons, who were involved in the same common ruin with the guilty.

> AFTER a conduct so barbarous and impolitic, there was little reason to expect that the people of Lisbon would be able soon to overcome their averfion to the Spanish government. From their dread of Alva's tyranny they took the oath of allegiance which was prescribed to them; and, from the same motive, they witnessed those public rejoicings which he appointed to be celebrated on account of his fucces; but being unable to conceal the anguish of their minds, the acclamations which they uttered were feeble and languid, and intermixed with fighs and groans.

> THE duke of Alva's joy, foon after his entrance into Lisbon, was interrupted by intelligence which he received from Spain, that Philip had fallen fick. and that his physicians were extremely apprehenfive of the issue of his distemper. Alva knew that the king's death, at this crifis, would probably render all his labours and success in Portugal abortive, and therefore he suspended for a while the profecution of the war.

In this interval Don Antonio exerted himself Bon Autonio with great activity, and employed every expedient which

Thusnus, c. lxx. c. x.

which he or his partizans could devise to raise ano- B o o E ther army, flattering himself with the hope of be-, XVI. ing able to maintain his ground, till the French, or forme other foreign power should be persuaded to espouse his cause. In the town of Santaren he had lately been received by the people as their only rightful fovereign, and every mark of affection and respect had been shewn him; yet so great a change had his defeat and flight produced, that they refused to admit him within the town, till he engaged that he should not remain in it beyond a limited time, and, immediately after his departure, they fent ambassadors to the duke of Alva, with an offer of submission,

FROM Santaren Antonio directed his course northwards, and in the province which lies between the Minho and Douro, he prevailed upon eight or nine thousand of the inhabitants to take up arms. With these tumultuary troops he procured admittance, partly by force and partly by persuasion, first into Aveiro, and afterwards into the city of Oporto; but in both these places he exercised a degree of severity towards those whom he suspected to be his enemies, that was extremely ill calculated to increase the number of his friends.

He remained at Oporto till he was informed that the duke of Alva, being delivered from his anxiety with regard to the king's health, had fent a part of his forces against him, under Sancio D'Avila, who was advancing towards the banks of the Douro with great rapidity. D'Avila had under his command only five or fix thousand horse and foot, and Antonio's army confisted of about nine thoufand; but from past experience, the latter was deeply sensible of the difference between his undisciplined forces and those of d'Avila, and he was well acquainted with the character of that general: who, in the Netherlands, and other places, had given the most conspicuous proofs of military skill and intrepidity. His fafety he knew depended on

Vol. II. DigitizehisGoogle Book his preventing the Spaniards from croffing the Douro, which, for many miles above Oporto, was fo deep and rapid, that without boats they could 1580. not attempt to pass it. He exerted himself therefore with diligence in removing the boats and barks from the fouth fide of the river, and planted his troops at different places on the north fide, to watch the motions of the enemy.

Progress of

In the mean time d'Avila advanced, and took the spaniards possession of Villanova, a little town which stands under d'Avi. possession of Villanova, opposite to Oporto. From that place he sent a party of his troops in fearch of boats; who returned without success: but d'Avila being resolved to omit nothing in his power to accomplish his design, fent them back with orders to purfue their march a great way further up the river, which they did accordingly, and collected about twenty boats, from places at fo great a distance from Oporto, that Antonio had judged it unnecessary to remove Still, however, most of the Spanish officers thought it impracticable to effectuate their passage with so small a number; and it was imposlible to bring them down the river, by reason of certain armed veffels which Antonio kept ready to intercept them, To remedy this inconvenience, d'Avila ordered a part of his troops to march up to the place where the boats lay, and there he transported them, without opposition, to the opposite fide. These troops had time to intrench themfelves, before the enemy received intelligence of their landing; and, under the shelter of their intrenchments, the rest of the forces were immediately carried over in the same way.

Defeat of Don Antonio.

This unexpected fuccess in the beginning of his enterprise, gave d'Avila the highest assurance of victory, and demonstrated how little reason he had to dread the efforts of an enemy, who, on fo critical an occasion, had shewn themselves so deficient both in courage and vigilance. Their conduct

HISTORY OF THE REIGN, &c.

Book XVI.

1580. and of the colonies.

THE colonies in America, Africa, and the Indies, which belonged to the crown of Portugal, quickly followed the example of the mothercountry; nor did Philip find employment for his arms in any part of the Portuguese dominions but the Azores, where Antonio's agents had perfuaded the people to proclaim him king. Some troops which were fent against them under an officer of the name of Valdes, were defeated by the governor of Angra. In the following year Antonio obtained from the court of France, a fleet of fixty ships, with about fix thousand troops, which he landed on one of the ifles called St. Michael; but the marquis of Santa Croce coming upon him with a fleet and army much superior to his, obtained a decisive victory over the French both by sea and land, and afterwards reduced all the inhabitants to a state of entire subjection and obedience s.

THE success of Philip's arms, and the great accession of dominion which he had thereby acquired, occasioned much anxiety to the neighbouring powers; and excited in the Dutch and Flemings the most alarming apprehensions. They had with infinite difficulty withstood his efforts, while he was employed in the pursuit of that plan of conquest which he had now carried into execution; and they feemed, at this time, to have much greater reason than ever to dread that they should soon be obliged to submit to whatever terms of peace he should be pleased to prescribe. Yet, as will appear in the fequel, Philip's acquisition of the Portuguese dominions in India served rather to expose him to the affaults of his revolted subjects, than to furnish him with the means of fubduing them, and contributed more than any other event to that wealth and greatness which they afterwards attained .

THE

Thuani hist. sui temp. ann, 1579-80. Cabrera, l. xili. Fe:-

teras, part xv. &c.

f Antonio escaped, and once more returned to France, and the marquis de Santa Croce treated all his French prisoners as pirates, because war had not been declared between France and Spain.

HISTORY

OF THE REIGN OF

PHILIP THE SECOND, KING OF SPAIN.

BOOK XVII.

fubduing the Portuguese, the prince of Parma had little room for the exertion of that activity and enterprise by which he was so emissiate of asset of afnently distinguished. Having, according to his saire in the late agreement with the southern provinces, dismissed his Spanish and Italian forces, he had thereby weakened his army so much, as to render it unable to keep the field. The States of these provinces had laboured in vain to fulfil their part of the agreement. Their finances were exhausted, all their levies were carried on slowly, and their cavalry were so few in number, that they had been obliged to consent that Farnese should retain some of the foreign horse for his body-guard.

Ir was fortunate for him, that at this juncture the confederates were in a fimilar state of weakness. After the departure of their auxiliaries, only a small number of troops remained; and, after 1580, Book the revolt of fo many of the nobility, and the death of the count de Bossut, which happened about this time, there was scarcely a single officer, a native of the Netherlands, whom they could intrult with the chief command. Matthias, a young man of no experience, bore the name, but was incapable of discharging the duties of governor. The whole weight of the administration lay upon the prince of Orange, who was involved in an endless maze of the most intricate political negociations; and without his continual presence, activity, and vigilance, the weak frame of the confederacy would quickly have fallen to pieces. William was therefore obliged to leave the direction of military affairs to the count of Renneberg. La Noue, and Norris; and although these men were not deficient either in spirit and intrepidity. or in prudence and good conduct, yet they neither had forces fufficient to undertake any important enterprise, nor means to support such as were under their command *.

> THE greatest part of Brabant and Flanders had acceded to the union of Utrecht; but the strength of the confederacy was not proportioned to its ex-The union of the feveral members was not fufficiently compact, the administration was not properly ascertained, and there was no common centre of power and authority established. troops were scattered in small bodies throughout the provinces; no adequate provision was made for their pay; they lived at free quarters on the inhabitants; and, as luxury is the constant attendant of licentiousness, the country was miserably oppressed and plundered, and the people reduced to an incapacity of furnishing the necessary contributions and supplies. In this situation many persons lamented that they had not embraced the opportunity lately afforded them, of making their peace with the king; and they began to accuse the prince of of Orange who had advised them to reject the conditions that had been offered, of having preferred. his private interest to that of the provinces. A spirit of discontent prevailed every where, except in Holland and Zealand, and it was generally believed, that they must soon either make their peace with the king of Spain, or elect some other sovereign, who was able to deliver them from the calamities with which they were overwhelmed.

THE prince of Orange was at this time in Ghent, Thecauses of employed in quieting the disturbances above men-their distress. tioned. At the defire of the States he published a vindication of his conduct, together with his fentiments concerning the causes of that diffress in which the provinces were involved, and the means of their deliverance. As what he faid on this occafion, and fome weeks afterwards, in the affembly of the States at Antwerp, contains an interesting view of the situation of the Netherlands at the prefent period, it will not be improper to lay before the reader an abiliract of the principal particulars.

HE began with complaining of the injustice of Explained by those by whom he had been accused of having con-orange. tributed to render ineffectual the late negociation "For no person in the Neof peace at Cologn. therlands, he faid, had greater reason than himself to wish for peace, since without it he could never hope to obtain either the liberty of his fon, whom he had not feen for many years, or the recovery of the many rich inheritances which he had loft, or the power of passing the remainder of his life, which now began to decline, free from labour and anxiety. But while for these reasons, joined with compassion for the miseries of the people, no person could more ardently desire to have an end put to the war, he could not help regarding war, with all its calamities, as infinitely preferable to the proffered peace; by one article of v hich many hundred thoulands of the inhabitants would have been driven into exile; and by ano-

Digitized by GOOGLE

HISTORY OF THE REIGN OF

1580.

104

Book ther, all who remained, exposed to the mercy of the Spaniards, without any security either for their liberty or their lives, but the promises of those by whom the most solemn oaths had been often violated. These were not his sentiments only of the peace that had been offered, but the sentiments likewise of the States, and of all the fincere friends of their country; nor could that detraction and calumny in which many persons had of late indulged themfelves, be ascribed to any other cause, but the secret machinations of those, who, from selfish views, were defirous of reducing the Netherlands under the Spanish yoke?

> "There was much ground, he acknowledged, for complaining of the irregularities of which the troops had been guilty in some of the provinces; but nothing could be more unjust than to throw the blame on those who were entrusted with the reins of government. The governors of states ought to be judged of fometimes by the orders which they issued, and not by the success with which their measures were accompanied; for what could it avail to interpose their authority, when they wanted power to enforce obedience? The difregard shewn by many, to the orders of the States and council, was the principal fource of the evils complained of. In all the provinces, except Holland and Zealand, there was scarcely a single town that would admit the garrisons appointed for its defence. To this was to be airribed that facility with which the enemy had made themselves masters of Allost, and other places; and it was owing to the same cause, that the troops were so much scattered throughout the provinces; the consequence of which was, that the inhabitants of the country and of the open towns, suffering equally from the forces of the States that lived at free quarters upon them, and from the incursions of the enemy, were totally disabled from contributing their share of the public expences. Thus there was no fund sufficient for the regular payment of the troops; without which, it was in vain Book to expect either that they could be kept under proper discipline, or employed successfully in any important enterprise.

Digitized by GOOSment

1 580.

- "To remedy the abuses complained of, the most effectual method was to place numerous garrisons in the frontier towns. For if this were done, the great number of small garrisons would become unnecessary; and the interior parts of the provinces being thereby delivered both from the oppressions of their friends and the devastations of the enemy, the people would be more able to furnish their proportion of the supplies, the troops would be paid more regularly, and discipline more easily maintained.
- "THE States ought not however to stop there, but to exert themselves strenuously in drawing together such an army of regular forces, as might face the enemy in the field, or at least disturb and interrupt their operations. It was their want of fuch an army that had occasioned the loss of Maestricht; and, if care were not taken to supply that want, there was ground to apprehend, that the confederacy would foon be stript of all the towns in the inland provinces. But in order to carry this, or any other expedient into execution, it was necessary that, instead of suffering each town or province to dispose of its troops and contributions as it thought fit, a fenate or council should be established, with authority to determine every thing relative to the application of the public funds and the conduct of the war.
- " He was far from intending that this council should be invested with the power either of imposing taxes or of enacting laws. He meant only that it should be empowered to levy such taxes as were imposed, and to execute such laws as were enacted, by the general States of the union. That it should not be subject to be controuled by particular towns

HISTORY OF THE

106

1580.

Book or provinces; nor obliged, in money, distributing garrisons, motions of the troops, to hav emergency to the States; but degree of discretionary power as would enable it to feize t action when they offered, and rations of the war with fecrecy

William exhorts the their allegiance.

BESIDES these and some confederates importance, William ventured to renounce ing which he published, and a fembly of the States, to ext concerning another fubject, revolved, and concerning wl the inclinations of many of the before the present period, could ever be reflored between confederated provinces, he e to confider, whether they we tion which required that, ren ance to Philip, they should other prince, who was able a them.

His reasons.

In the eyes of the greater proposal appeared in the high Philip had, ever fince his acce as the most powerful prince lately received an immense the acquisition of Portugal. doubt that the revolted provide to his superior arms, and b offence which they had given

Reasons however were no that the measure proposed wa people of the Netherlands co present circumstances. If the tained the prospect of obtaini terms, it might be difficult per dicate their conduct. The evil change of government, are go

NIN. 1504

· fer- Book ie had IWCTP ice it. al on Tuffer. be in

The state of the s

The second second A STATE OF THE PARTY. THE PERSON NAMED IN

NE procellary unded IE WAS below. ald the ftrong u fides which, umber mithed. ged in country fortune quanti-OE IF on the ar and estedly mpoffi-- who Aldestwarp.

HISTORY OF THE REIGN OF

Book or provinces; nor obliged, in applying the public money, distributing garrisons, and regulating the motions of the troops, to have recourse on every emergency to the States; but should have such a degree of discretionary power conferred upon it, as would enable it to feize the opportunities of action when they offered, and to conduct the operations of the war with secrecy and dispatch."

William exhorts the

106

BESIDES these and some other points of less confederates importance, William ventured, both in the writto renounce ing which he published, and afterwards in the asfembly of the States, to explain his fentiments concerning another subject, which he had long revolved, and concerning which he had founded the inclinations of many of the deputies. Having, before the present period, despaired that peace could ever be reftored between the king and the confederated provinces, he exhorted the deputies to confider, whether they were not now in a fituation which required that, renouncing their allegiance to Philip, they should transfer it to some other prince, who was able and willing to defend them.

His reasons.

In the eyes of the greater part of Europe, this proposal appeared in the highest degree audacious. Philip had, ever since his accession, been considered as the most powerful prince of the age; he had lately received an immense increase of power by the acquisition of Portugal, and men could not doubt that the revolted provinces must foon yield to his superior arms, and bitterly repent of the offence which they had given him.

REASONS however were not wanting to shew. that the measure proposed was the best which the people of the Netherlands could embrace in their present circumstances. If they could have entertained the prospect of obtaining peace on tolerable terms, it might be difficult perhaps entirely to vindicate their conduct, The evils which accompany a change of government, are generally to great, and 1580.

the obligation to maintain the present, so strong Book and powerful, that nothing but the most urgent necessity can ever justify a people for shaking off their allegiance to their legal prince. But, from the issue of the late negociations at Cologn, it was manifest, not only that Philip was unalterably fixed in his purpose to govern the Netherlands with despotic authority, in contradiction to their fundamental rights and laws; but that the utter extirpation of the protestants, who were now become the most considerable part of the people, was a condition, without which he was determined never to be reconciled. Desolation therefore, and flavery, must have been the certain consequences of peace, and no greater evils could be apprehended from a continuance of the war. "Even allowing (said the prince of Orange, in the assembly of the States) that the king should be persuaded, by any mediating power, to grant us fuch conditions as our consciences would suffer us to accept, yet what fecurity can we obtain for his fulfilling them? He has, before this time, been let at liberty by the pope from his most sacred obligations. It is an established maxim of Philip and his counsellors, that with heretics, such as we are, no promises or oaths are binding. Although he were of himself inclined to fulfil his engagements, yet the Roman pontiff and the Spanish inquisitors would reclaim, and foon persuade him to alter his intention. has been faid by fome, continued William, that he is a prince of a compassionate disposition, and that we may fafely rely upon his mercy. Of the truth of this, we can best judge from what we have sen and known. Do the deeds that have been perpetrated by his command, in India, in Italy, or in Granada, authorise us to form this favourable judgment of his character? Has not every corner of the Netherlands been overflowed with the blood of thousands of our countrymen, barbarously butchered by his command? Are not all the neighbouring kingdoms filled with his subjects, who hayted by Google

1580.

Book have been driven from their native land, either to enrich the countries that have afforded them protection, with our trade and manufactures, or to drag out a miserable life in poverty and exile? We know how grievously our late conduct has offended him, and from what we have feen on former occasions, we may judge of the measure of his refentment. He may humble himself so far as to foothe us with the hopes of a more mild administration; but we should remember the discovery which we made lately, when, by the letters that were intercepted, it appeared, that instead of the generous purposes that were pretended, nothing was meant but to employ some of the provinces as instruments of vengeance against the rest."

INFLUENCED by these considerations, which Opposition of the catholics shewed that Philip had entirely lost the confidence as well as the affections of his Flemish subjects, a great majority of the deputies were inclined to renounce his authority. Some of the catholic members, however, prompted partly by political principles, and partly by concern for the fafety of their religion, had the courage to remonstrate. They expatiated on the greatness of Philip's power, and the danger to which the States would expose themselves, by adding so great an affront to their former provocations. And to their representations on this head they subjoined, that they could not adopt the strong measure that was proposed, consistently with their oath of allegiance; fince the king was unquestionably their rightful fovereign, they had all folemnly recognised his right; and the provinces were his inheritance. which he had derived from a long uninterrupted line of illustrious ancestors b.

> Bur this reasoning had no weight with the prince of Orange, St. Aldegonde, and the other leaders of the protestants. They considered the breach b Bentivoglio, part ii. l. i.

Digitized by Google

breach between Philip and the confederated pro- Book vinces, as irreparable; and knew, that long before the present period, he was animated against them with the most implacable resentment. was too late, they faid, to talk of keeping measures with the king; and no part remained to be efpouled, but to provide against the effects of his displeasure. Nor was there the smallest reason for those icruples by which the catholic members were disturbed, either with regard to the lawfulness, or the expediency of renouncing their allegiance. Kings were invested with authority, not for their own sakes, but for the interest of the people whom they were appointed to govern. If the rights of princes were to be investigated. they would be found, in most of the kingdoms in Europe, to have been derived from the will of their subjects, who, grown impatient under the injuries of former princes, had taken from them, and given to their fuccessors, what they had an undoubted right to bestow. A prince was indeed fuperior to each individual in a State; but neither his interest, nor his pleasure was to be put in the balance with the security and happiness of the whole. On the contrary, he might be judged, and even punished for his abuse of power, by the supreme council of the nation. If this truth were doubted of in other places, it could not be controverted in the Netherlands; where, till lately, both the name of king, and the measure of obedience which kings commonly require, were utterly unknown. In the Netherlands the engagements between the prince and the people were strictly mutual; and in engagements of this fort, it was a clear and universal maxim, that the infidelity of either of the two contracting parties, abfolves the other from the most sacred obligation c.

THE protestant members, in comparison with Deliberations about whom the catholics were few in number, being electing anothus ther love-

Meteren, lib. x. and Grotius, p 70.

Digitized by Google

Book thus confirmed in their purpose of abjuring the dominion of Philip, the affembly proceeded next to confider, whether they should substitute another fovereign in his place, or establish a republican government, upon the plan of that confederacy which was already formed. The latter of these measures would have been embraced by all the deputies; by the protestants, from the conformity between the principles of a commonwealth, and those of their religion; and by the catholics, from their persuasion that such a government would neither be so highly affronting to the king, nor so effectually preclude the hopes of a future reconcilement. But the present feeble state of the United Provinces obliged them to facrifice their inclination to their preservation and security. From the representation which the prince of Orange made of the disorders that prevailed, together with the view which he exhibited of their strength and resources, they were convinced, that however strenuously they might exert themselves, they would be able to wage only a tedious defensive war; by which their strength would be gradually wasted. till they were at last compelled to accept of such terms of peace as the king should be pleased to prescribe. To have recourse therefore to the assistance of some foreign prince, seemed not only expedient, but necessary; and to engage the prince of whom they should make choice to espoule their cause with greater zeal and sincerity than they had hitherto experienced in their allies, they resolved to confer upon him the sovereignty of the provinces, with all the prerogatives which had been enjoyed by the princes of the house of Burgundy.

Motives for Nothing now remained but to fix upon the duke of An person to whom the offer of this high dignity jou. The prince of Orange, having beforehand sounded the inclinations of the emperor and other German princes, had sound them utterly averse from taking any concern in the affairs of the Netherlands. The queen of England, Book and the duke of Anjou, brother to the king of France, were the only princes at that time in Europe, between whom the States thought there was ground to helitate; and they were determined to concur in giving the preference to Anjou, by the prince of Orange; who, belides representing to them the necessity of electing a sovereign who would refide in the country, informed them that their making choice of the duke, would be highly acceptable to the queen. " For the had writ to birm on the subject, and given him affurances of granting the States her affiftance, in case the sovereignty were conferred on one with whom the had so much reason to expect to live on amicable terms 4,"

Digitized by Google affairs

PHILIP II. KING OF SPAIN.

FROM this it should feem, that William had offered to employ his influence in favour of Elizabeth; and it may be prefumed, that unless he had found her averie to his proposal, neither he nor the other protestant leaders would have been inclined to give the preference to Anjou. Very different motives indeed were affigued for the prince's conduct, by his enemies. His principality of Orange, they observed, lay in the centre of France. He had lately married Charlotte de Bourbon, of the blood royal of that kingdom *. For many years he had maintained an intimate correspondence with the leaders of the Hugonots; and he flattered himself with the hopes of enjoying the entire direction of the duke of Anjou, a weak prince, who would probably be more attentive to his pleasures, than to the affairs of government These interested considerations, it is likely, were not entirely without their influence; but the other circumstance above mentioned seems to afford a flill more fatisfactory account, fince there was in reality no room for helitation between Elizabeth and Anjou; and Elizabeth, as will appear in the fequel, would certainly have rejected the fove-

4 Meteren, lib. x. . Daughter of the duke de Montpenher.

Book reignty, in case an offer of it had been made to her. This political princess expected to derive advantage from that animolity which the election of Anjou was likely to produce between the courts of France and Spain. And the prince of Orange knew, that as it would be easier to reconcile the catholics in the United Provinces to the election of a prince of the same religion with themselves, than to that of a protestant; so, without making such a choice, there was little probability that he should ever prevail on the Walloons to accede to the confederacy. Whatever were William's motives, a great majority of the deputies entered readily into his opinion, and they would have proceeded instantly to the election, if it had not been deemed a matter of too much consequence to be decided without consulting their constituents.

La Noue taken prifoner.

In the mean time the operations of the war were not wholly discontinued, although neither of the two contending parties was in a condition at this period to make any great or vigorous exertion. By means of a stratagem conducted by count Egmont, Farnese acquired possession of Courtray in Flanders, as he did by the like means of some other places. On the other hand, count Egmont and his brother were taken prisoners by La Noue in the town of Ninove: and not long afterwards La Noue himself lost his liberty. This gallant officer having been attacked unexpectedly by the marquis de Roubais, commander in chief of the Walloon forces, was overpowered by numbers, and obliged, through the disadvantage of his ground, to furrender himself a prisoner of war. The States were fenfibly affected by the lofs of a person of such uncommon abilities, and they offered to give in exchange for him count Egmont and the baron de Selles, who had been taken prisoner at Bouchain. But the prince of Parma refused to confent to this exchange, and faid, that he would never agree to give one lion for two sheep. Noue was conducted to the castle of Limburg.

Digitized by Goog where where he remained long; and, during his confinement, employed himself in writing those military and political discourses which were afterwards published, and much admired by his cotemporaries. Count Egmont's relations, and those of de Selles, solicited Philip with great importunity to consent to the exchange proposed. But this prince, who never hearkened to the voice of gratitude or compassion where his interest interfered, declined complying with their request; and, rather than yield to the enemy so great an advantage as the recovery of La Noue, he chose to leave his friends to languish in prison for several years.

THESE two noblemen bore this indignity with extreme impatience. De Selles, conscious of having exerted himself with the most fervent zeal in detaching the Walloons from the revolted provinces, fell a facrifice to the indignation and chagrin which the king's ingratitude and his own unfortunate situation were calculated to inspire. The same causes produced a different, but no less melancholy effect, on count Egmont, whom they deprived of the use of his understanding. Through the tender affiduous care of his fifter, whom the States permitted to attend him, he recovered from this diffress. But Philip still declined consenting to the exchange, till the year 1584, when La Noue engaged in the strictest manner never to bear arms against him in the Netherlands; and the king of Navarre, the duke of Lorrain, and others, became fureties for his fulfilling this en-It is difficult to determine whether gagement. Philip's conduct afforded on this occasion a more striking proof of pusillanimity or ingratitude, while no stronger testimony could have been given of the extraordinary merit of La Noue, and the dread which his enemies entertained of his abilities '.

Vol. II. ABOUT

Bentivoglio, part ii. lib. i. Reidanus, lib. ii. p. 39. and Meteren.

XVII. 1580. neberg,

ABOUT the time when La Noue was taken prifoner, the confederacy sustained another loss by the defection of count Renneberg. This young Defection of nobleman having been appointed governor of Friesland by the States, had subdued the cities of Deventer and Groningen, besides several other places of confiderable consequence; and his zeal and fervices were the more highly valued, as all his relations adhered to the Spanish interest, and he himself was of the catholic persuasion. But these circumstances which gave him so much merit in the eyes of his countrymen, were the means by which he was enticed to abandon the cause which he had hitherto so illustriously supported. prince of Parma readily perceived the advantage which they afforded for gaining him over from the confederates; and, with this view, he employed the count's fifter and her husband, the baron de Monceaux, to offer him the following terms of accommodation: That he should be confirmed in the government of Friefland, and have that of Overyssel annexed to it; that twenty thousand crowns should be immediately paid him, besides an annual pension of twenty thousand florins; that a town, of which he was feudal superior, should be erected into a marquifate; and that he should have two regiments of troops to be distributed throughout his governments, in whatever stations he should think fit. Besides these enticements. another object was held forth to him, more tempting perhaps than any of the rest; he was flattered with the hopes of obtaining in marriage the countess of Megen, of whom he was greatly enamoured, and who possessed one of the richest fortunes in the Netherlands. His religious principles confpired with these allurements, and made him lend an open ear to his fister's repeated representations of the danger to which the catholic faith was exposed, and of the designs formed by the prince of Orange for its destruction. He hesitated however ever for some time, and trembled at the thoughts Book of the infamy in which he was about to be involved; but at last he confented to accept of the terms proposed, resolving to conceal his having done so, till he should take proper measures for delivering the towns and forts into the hands of the Spaniards.

XVII. 1 580.

His design could not however entirely escape the penetrating eye of the prince of Orange. Various circumstances concurred to alarm William's apprehensions, which made him resolve, without delay, to prevent, if possible, the fatal effects of his intended treachery. He instantly went into Friefland, under the pretence of quelling some disturbances in that country, and ordered some officers to draw their troops together, and lead them against Lewarden, Harlingen, and Staveren. These orders were executed with secrecy and dispatch, and all the three places were wrested out of the hands of those to whom count Renneberg had committed them.

THE count, who resided at this time in Groningen, was thunderstruck when he received intelligence of this disafter, which at once shewed him that his perfidy was detected, and put it in a great measure out of his power to fulfil his engagements to the prince of Parma. Still, however, he was either not prepared, or he had not courage, to throw off the mask. He complained loudly of the affront that had been offered him, and of the ingratitude with which his fervices had been repaid. Among the officers who witneffed his confusion on this occasion, there were two to whom, as he knew their fidelity to the States to be inviolable, he had not communicated his designs. These men, thinking it still practicable to preserve him in his duty, exhorted him to go immediately to the prince of Orange, in order to clear himself from the suspicions which were entertained against him. "This is the only expedient in your power, said one

B o o k XVII. one of them, if you are conscious of innocence; nor can I doubt that you are, when I consider, that by persisting to act the part which your duty and honour require, you must promote your interest more effectually, than by violating these sacred obligations, and involving your name in perpetual insamy." Renneberg listened attentively to this discourse, changed colour frequently, and at last burst into tears. He repeated his complaints of the treatment which he had met with, but he would not explain his intentions, nor comply with his friend's advice. The two officers then left him; and, after acquainting the chief magistrate of what had passed, they withdrew privately from the city.

By a popular and infinuating behaviour, accompanied with strong asseverations of the false-hood of the reports which had been propagated, Renneberg laid asseep the suspicions both of the magistrates and the people, till the plot which he had formed was ripe for execution. Having brought in secretly a body of troops, which he concealed in the palace, and put arms into the hands of his domestics; with these, and the catholic inhabitants devoted to the Spanish interest, he overpowered the garrison; and having thus made himself master of the town, he proclaimed himself governor, in the name of Philip, and then mounted the fortifications with the troops which he had introduced.

Reaneherg's remorfe and death.

But he did not long enjoy any of the advantages which he expected to derive from his revolt, and some of them he never attained. The money promised him was never paid, and the counters of Megen was given in marriage to another. His health being impaired by the fatigues which he had undergone in his military enterprises, the remembrance of his treachery filled his mind with anguish and remorse, which preyed upon his sickly ly frame, and carried him off in the prime of his Book age, lamented even by those whom he had betrayed, who felt for his misfortunes, on account of his many amiable accomplishments s.

1580.

THE losses which the confederacy suffered from Election of La Noue's imprisonment, and the infidelity of Anjou. Renneberg, served only to confirm them in their resolution of conferring the sovereignty on some foreign prince; and the reasons above mentioned. joined to the influence of the prince of Orange, determined the States of the several provinces and towns to give the preference to the duke of Anjou. The election was made accordingly in due form by the General States, and a solemn embasily sent to give intimation of it to the duke, who readily accepted the offer, and consented to all the conditions annexed to it. They were contained in a treaty figned by him and the ambassadors of the States at Plessi-les-Tours, on the 29th of September; and the principal articles were those which "That the States of the United Pro- The condivinces having elected Francis de Valois, duke of tions of it. Alençon and Anjou, for their fovereign, did thereby confer upon him all the titles and prerogatives which their former princes had enjoyed. That in case the duke should die without issue, the States might elect another fovereign, and that the Netherlands should in no event be annexed to the crown of France. That in case the duke should die leaving feveral fons behind him, the States should have powerto determine which of them should succeed him in the fovereignty, and that if the prince whom they should make choice of were under age, they might assume the government into their own hands till he should arrive at the age of twenty. That the duke should maintain inviolate, all the rights and privileges of the people; that he should summon the general assembly of the States to meet at least once a year; and that, if he should Book fail to iffue letters of convocation, they should , themselves have power, agreeably to ancient form and custom, to meet together as often as they should judge expedient. That the duke should fix his residence in the Low Countries; but if his affairs should, on any occasion, call him thence, he should nominate for governor some nobleman a native of the Netherlands, with the consent and approbation of the States. That all his counsellors should be natives of the provinces, except two or three of the French nation, who might be admitted into the council, provided the States should give their consent. That he should make no innovation in religion, but afford his protection equally to the protestants and catholics. Holland and Zealand should, both in respect of government and religion, remain in their present state, being obliged, however, to contribute their proportion of the supplies requisite for the support of the confederacy. That the duke should spare no pains to engage his brother the king of France to affift him in carrying on the war; that he should accede to all the treaties that subsist between the States and foreign powers, and should not himself form any new alliance without their consent. That all foreign soldiers should be dismissed on the first requisition of the States: And lastly, That if the duke should fail in performing any of the foregoing conditions, his right to the fovereignty should cease, and the provinces be no longer bound to yield obedience to his authority."

As this treaty was negociated in France; Philip complained to Henry of his breach of friendship in permitting it; and Henry affected to be much offended with his brother's conduct, but in reality he did not feel that displeasure which he pretended. On the contrary he secretly rejoiced in the prospect of being delivered from a brother, whose levity and caprice had given him much inquietude: and and it is said, that he assured the States privately, that he would fend them either troops or money, as foon as the troubles of his kingdom were composed.

Book 15804

Bur whatever reason Philip had to be offended Philip's prowith the French monarch, he was much more the prince of highly incenfed against the prince of Orange, Orange, whom he confidered as the contriver, as well as the chief promoter of the revolution that had taken place. Having oftner than once attempted. by negociation and artifice, to free himself from an enemy, who had furnished employment to his ablest generals and best disciplined forces for so many years, he had recourse, on this occasion, to the ignoble expedient of exciting some wretch or desperado to make an attempt upon his life. For this purpose he published an edict of proscription against him, in which he accused him of having excited and fomented that spirit of discord, which had proved the source of so much misery to the Netherlands; interdicted all the subjects of the crown of Spain from holding communication with him, and from supplying him with bread, or drink, or fire; and offered to any person, who should deliver him dead or alive, or take away his life, the sum of twenty-five thousand crowns, befides making him and his affociates noble, if they were not already noble, and granting them a full pardon of all crimes, however enormous, of which they had been guilty.

This practice of commanding affassination, almost unheard-of since the days of the Roman triumvirate, was suitable to the dark, revengeful, and ungenerous nature of Philip. The prince of Orange could have retaliated the injury; but he scorned so ignoble a revenge, and chose rather to rest his defence on an appeal to the world for his integrity.

Воок XVII. 1580.

His Vindication or Apology, addressed to the affembly of the States, and of which he fent copies to the several courts in Europe, is one of the most His Apology precious monuments of history. It contains an interesting relation of many particulars, which throw light, not only on William's own character and that of Philip, but likewise on the characters of feveral of the other principal actors in the Ne-The author has, in some parts of it. therlands. indulged himself in the language of keen resentment, and ventured to affert boldly feveral facts, of which the cotemporary historians have spoken Some allowance perhaps must be with referve. made for that just indignation with which he was inflamed; but when it is confidered, that no perfon had better access to information; that no prince possessed a higher character for sincerity and truth, having never, in a fingle instance, been convicted by his numerous enemies of infincerity and falsehood; that the relation of the facts which he afferts was published at the time when they are faid to have happened, and when it was easy for the persons accused, if accused unjustly, to have confuted him; that their interest and honour called loudly for a confutation; and yet, that no fuch confutation, nor any vindication of their characters, which had been arraigned as odious at the bar of the universe, was ever attempted. When all these circumstances are duly considered, there does not appear any fufficient reason for calling in question the facts contained in this Apology, although some of them are of such a nature as to require the strongest evidence to justify the reader for yielding his affent .

Adopted by the States.

THE conduct of the confederated States on this occasion was such as William had reason to expect. After employing feveral days in examining his Apology, h An abstract of this Apology is subjoined to the conclusion of this work.

Apology, they voted him an affectionate address, Boom in which they attested the falsehood of those imputations on which Philip had founded his profcription. They declared, that as the prince had been regularly elected into the feveral offices which he held, so he had never accepted of any office but in consequence of their most earnest entreaties. They prayed him still to exercise the authority with which they had invested him, expressed their gratitude for his many eminent fervices to the commonwealth, and promifed to yield a ready and cheerful obedience to his commands. They concluded with expressing their anxiety for his life, and made him an offer of maintaining a company of horse-Dec. 17. guards, of which they intreated him to accept, being persuaded that on his preservation their own fecurity depended.

1480.

In a few days afterwards they gave him another proof of that zeal and fincerity with which they solemn re-had espoused his cause. Their election of the of their alleduke of Anjou was a virtual renunciation of their giance to allegiance to their former fovereign; yet all public acts ran as before in the name of Philip and that of the States: the oath administered to persons entering upon public offices had not been altered, and the people in some of those cities in the confederacy, which had conferred to Anjou's election, were extremely averse to alter it, from that attachment which men often discover to exterior forms, even after the inflitutions on which they were originally founded have been abolished; but the States, sensible at last of the incongruity between these forms and the steps which they had lately taken, and apprehensive of danger from leaving it in any respect ambiguous to whom the people owed their allegiance, agreed now to remove all ground of ambiguity by a folemn abjuration of Philip as their fovereign.

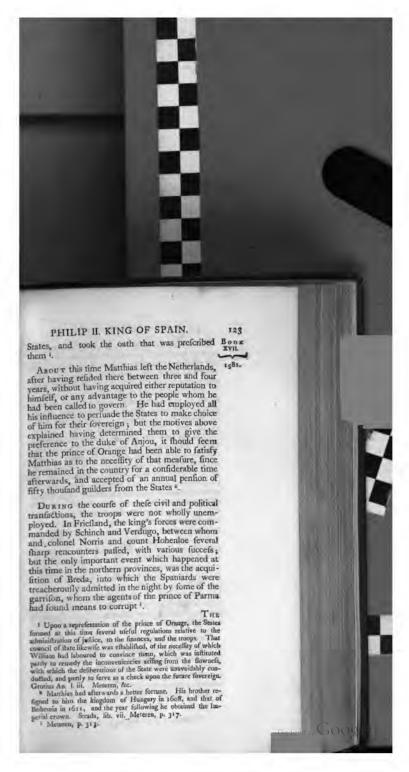

Αn

122

Book XVII.

An act of abjuration was accordingly passed, with great unanimity, in an affembly held on purpole at the Hague, consisting of deputies from Brabant, Guelderland, Zutphen, Flanders, Holland, Zealand, Utrecht, Overyssel, and Friesland. In this act, after enumerating the principal grievances which had prompted them to form their present resolution, they declared it to be a right inherent in every free people, to withdraw their allegiance from a prince who obstinately refuses to fulfil the duty which he owes them; and much more from one who violates the fundamental laws, and acts the part of a tyrant and oppressor. They pronounced Philip to have forfeited for ever all authority in the Netherlands. They forbade all judges and others to use his name, arms, or seal; and they required the magistrates of towns, and all other persons in public offices, to bind themselves by an oath to oppose him and his adherents to the utmost of their power.

THESE resolutions were carried into immediate execution. All Philip's feals were broken, all commissions and letters patent in his name were cancelled, and the new oath was administered to every person who possessed any civil or military employment. It was not without difficulty that the magistrates in some towns were persuaded to take this oath. Some remaining scruples of conscience, arising from a regard to their former oaths, gave uneafiness to several; and others doubted of the expediency of so strong a measure at the prefent crisis, on account of the ships and merchandite belonging to the people of the Netherlands, which were in the ports of Spain. But no pains were spared to remove these objections, and at last almost the whole inhabitants of the above mentiened provinces entered into the views of the States.

XAII.

THE prince himself was, in the mean time, intent on the reduction of Cambray. But not having a fufficient number of troops to carry on the fiege with vigour, he was obliged to convert it into a blockade. D'Inchi, the governor, had recourse for relief to the duke of Anjou, and was warmly feconded in his application by the States and the prince of Orange. Anjou perceiving how deeply his honour was concerned to gratify this first delire of his new subjects, published at the court of France his intention of attempting to raise the siege. This was no sooner known, than a great number of the nobility flocked from all parts of the kingdom, to his standard. With their assistance, he collected in a few days an army of near twelve thousand foot and four thousand horse, and marched directly towards Cambray. The prince of Parma, too prudent to contend with an army. which, besides being greatly superior to his own in number, was conducted by a brave and warlike nobility, quitted his intrenchments and retired. In this manner was Cambray delivered, after it had been blockaded for several months, during which the inhabitants had been reduced to great distress. Anjou having brought along with him an ample fupply of provisions, it was immediately introduced; and soon after, he made a magnificent entry into the city, amidst the applauses of the people, who faluted him, the Protector of their Liberty. He then laid siege to Chatteau-Cambresis, and quickly compelled the garrifon to furrender ...

This fuccess which attended Anjou's first enterprise afforded inexpressible pleasure to the confederated provinces, and served to heighten their expectations of his future government. He was earnestly intreated by the States to improve the present opportunity, and to advance with his army towards Flanders. But it was not in his power, m Moteren, p. 315. Bentivoglio, part ii. lib. ii.

PHILLIP IL KING OF SPAIN

In this time, it cannot not been expect. It is not a large of the control of the

There are no voting proof occurs to the semake the Frinch hing to great Arrive that allift-inlover drive at from the factor, reflect from of a homes, who had grown because the miches of in rough, he would have exceedy avenged himself or Pality, who had Rockly undertaken the prorelies of the curtain league, which, as will be efferwards related, had been largly fermed by the dake of Guile, as pureous at providing for the from of the until aligno, but in reality to control the formign's authority. But Henry was not to a confident at this time to make an open breach with Philip. By his indefence and vely mention, added to the memberle's calumian a which his largelism was involved, his finances were enumbered; reduced; and the king of Navarre on the one hand, and the duke of Guile on the other, fermilled more than fufficient emplayment to all the policy and power which he pullelled. Promiles therefore of future aid were all that Anjou could obtain from him, and this disappointment determined the duke to let out imneclearity for England, where it should feem he and Letter ground to hope for affiftance than in

EGILARITH

Same

Book XVIL 1581.

ELIZABETH had for some time past appeared to lend a favourable ear to a proposal of marriage which he had made to her; and his expectations were at present raised to the greatest height. On his arrival in England, the gave him the most gracious reception. Soon afterwards, The ordered her ministers to prepare the marriage contract; and, in the presence of many witnesses, after a long discourse with him apart, she took a ring from her own finger, and put it upon his; which both the spectators and the duke interpreted as a declaration of her consent. It is impossible to believe with fome historians, that Elizabeth meant only to amuse Anjou, and thereby to advance some political design. It is inconceivable how any defign whatever could be promoted by carrying her dissimulation to so great a length. This wife princess, notwithstanding the many extraordinary accomplishments which adorned her character, was not exempt from the weaknesses that are peculiarly incident to her fex. Flattered by the court which Anjou had long affiduously paid her, she appears to have entertained the most partial sentiments of affection towards him, and seriously to have intended to listen to his proposal. But at last her prudence, her ambition, and that love of independence which she had cherished through her whole life, prevailed over the temporary passion into which she had been betrayed. She made an apology to Anjou, for her change of resolution, and gave him the strongest assurances of affiftance and support in his new dominions. The marriage was no more mentioned, and the duke, after a stay of three months in England, set sail for the Low Countries; escorted by a fleet, on board which there there was a great number of archity and gentry, whom the queen had defined to arrend him, as a proof to his new finiteds, that although the intended marriage had not taken place, yet the was deeply interested in his proiperity.

PHILIP IL KING OF SPAIN.

THE

HISTORY

OF THE REIGN OF

PHILIP THE SECOND, KING OF SPAIN.

BOOK XVIII.

Anjou landed on the 10th of February, at Flushing. From Flushing he went to Middle-burgh, and was conducted from thence by a fleet Anjou's atof fifty ships of war to Antwerp. The banks of Netherlands, the Scheld, the entrance into the town, and the streets which led to the palace, were lined by the citizens, to the number of twenty thousand in arms; and no expence was saved, which a wealthy commercial city could afford, to express their attachment and respect. After having taken the usual oath to maintain their rights and privileges, he received from the States the oath of allegiance; and then entered upon the sovereignty, while all around him wore a face of happiness and joy.

In Antwerp, the public exercise of the catholic religion had for some time past been prohibited. But now, in order to gratify the new sovereign, it was permitted in one of the churches; and all Vol. II.

Book catholics were allowed to worship there, according to the rites of their religion, upon condition that they should abjure the king of Spain, and fwear allegiance to the duke. Only a few accepted of this indulgence, while the greater part chose rather to forego the privilege held forth to them, than so solemnly to renounce their former sovereign. On this occasion the States, as well as the duke, were not a little alarmed; and thought it necessary without delay to provide against the danger that might arise from persons who gave so clear a discovery of their dissaffection to the present establishment. They first published one edict, imposing a fine of 200 guilders on those who should decline taking the oaths; and soon afterwards another, by which the reculants were banished from the Netherlands ...

Attempt to Orange.

In the midst of these transactions, that joy affatfinate which Anjou's arrival had diffused throughout the provinces was interrupted, by an attempt which was made, not many days after his inauguration, upon the life of the prince of Orange. The delign was first conceived in Spain, by a man of the name of Isonca; and it was suggested by him to Gaspar Anastro, a Spanish banker in Antwerp, of ruined circumstances, as an expedient for retrieving his affairs. To induce Anaftro to undertake the execution of the bloody purpose, Honca fent him a fign-manual of the king, in which Philip engaged to pay him eighty thoufand ducats as foon as the affassination should be perpetrated. Anastro had not courage himself to execute so bold and desperate an enterprise, and therefore he communicated Isonca's proposal to John Jauregui, a menial servant in his family, a young Biscayan, of a thoughtful, melancholy disposition.

Meteren, p. 325.

disposition, whom he knew to be both trusty and Book audacious. With this young man Anastro found XVIII. there was little need for perfuaiion. "I am ready, faid he, to perform instantly what the king so earnestly desires. I despise equally the proffered reward, and the danger to which I shall be exposed: for I know that I shall die. I only ask that you will affift me with your prayers to God, and employ your interest with the king, to provide for my father in his old age." Jauregui was the better qualified to succeed in his design, as he spoke the German language fluently, and was in no danger of being known to be a Spaniard. He was confirmed in his purpose by a priest of the name of Timmerman; from whom he received absolution of his fins, and the strongest affurances, that by putting to death fo great a heretic as the prince of Orange, he would infallibly secure the favour of God and everlasting happiness.

UNDER a full conviction of the truth of what the priest had declared, this deluded wretch set out for the castle, and having taken his station near the door of the apartment in which the prince had dined, he watched the opportunity of his coming out; when stepping up to him, he discharged a pistol at his head, loaded with a single ball. The ball entered a little beneath his right ear, and passing under his palate and upper teeth, came out on the other fide. William was deprived for a moment of his fenses; which he no sooner recovered, than he defired his attendants to fave the life of the affaffin. But the guards, transported with fudden rage, had dispatched him. The appearance of the prince's wound, from the effusion of blood, was extremely formidable, and as he was deprived of his speech by the same cause, the spectators believed him to be at the point of death. The news of this disaster spread quickly over the town, and excited in all ranks of men, inexpressible 1 32

XVIII.

Book anguish and despair. The citizens poured in crowds from every quarter to learn the particulars of that calamity which had befallen them; and, as if each individual had lost his own proper parent, as well as the common parent of the state, there was nothing to be heard but the voice of forrow and lamentation.

> In the midst of this distress, a rumour was propagated, that the French were the authors of the murder, and that it had been perpetrated in order to deliver the duke of Anjou from the restraints which had been imposed on his authority. report gained easy credit from the people. Their grief was now converted into fury, and they flew to the palace with an intention to execute a speedy vengeance.

> In the mean time it was known at the castle, that the affassin was a Spaniard, from papers found in his pocket, by Maurice, the prince's fon b. Of this discovery, notice was immediately carried to the prince, who had now recovered his speech; and he was informed, at the same time, of the danger to which Anjou and his countrymen were exposed. This intelligence affected William in the most sensible manner; and notwithstanding his present critical situation, he wrote, with his own hand, a billet in exculpation of the French. By this, joined with the pains which were taken by St. Aldegonde, the people were undeceived and pacified. The affaffin's body having being exposed to public view, it was foon discovered that he had been a domestic of Anastro. Anastro himself had fled, but his fecretary, whom he had left behind, to wait the issue of Jauregui's attempt, and Timmerman, the priest, were seized, and having confessed confessed their guilt, they were condemned to Book fuffer death. At the defire of the prince of Orange, who never neglected an opportunity of inculcating humanity upon his countrymen, no tortures were inflicted on them. They were first strangled and then quartered, and their heads and limbs fixed over the gates of the city .

Maurice was at this time only fifteen years of age, but was even then remarkable for his attention and fagacity.

1582.

WILLIAM's recovery was dubious for some time, on account of the difficulty which the physicians found in stopping the effusion of blood; but after all their applications had failed, they made a number of persons succeed one another in pressing the mouth of the wound with their thumbs. without intermission, for the space of several days and nights; and this expedient proved at length. fuccefsful 4.

ANASTRO having gone from Antwerp to Tournay, where the prince of Parma then relided, affirmed confidently that William had died of his wound. Farnese too rashly believed him, and wrote letters to the citizens of Antwerp, and other places, exhorting them to return now to their duty. fince that person was removed by whom they had been led aftray. These letters would not have been calculated, in the present disposition of the people, to promote the prince of Parma's design, even if the information on which he proceeded had been true: but as they did not arrive till after the people were delivered from their apprehensions with regard to William's life, they served only to excite their ridicule and indignation .

MEANWHILE

They remained there till the city fell into the hands of the prince of Parina, when they were taken down by the popila ecclefiastics, and buried with every mark of veneration which their superstition could devise.

d While his life was in danger, a public supplication was offered up to heaven for his recovery; and when it was accomplished, a solemn thanksgiving was celebrated.

Bentivoglio, p. 263. Meteren, p. 326. Thuanus, lib. lxxv.

B o o k XVIII. 1582. Return of the Spanish troops.

MEANWHILE the operations of the war were not discontinued by either of the contending parties. The States acquired possession of the town of Allost, and the prince of Parma made himself master of Steenwick and Lierres, foon after enabled to act with greater vigour than the weakness of his army had hitherto permitted him to exert. Having consented with great reluctance to the dismission of the Italian and Spanish troops, he had employed all his address to convince the Walloons that it was in vain for them to expect, with their own forces alone, to bring the war to a conclusion. He found it extremely difficult to overcome their diffidence, and was obliged to observe the utmost caution, in order to avoid awakening those suspicions which they had long indulged against the Spaniards. At length however he accomplished his design through the marquis de Roubais, who, as was mentioned above, had acted a principal part in promoting the reconcilement of the fouthern provinces. nobleman, Farnese had formed an intimate connexion, and had laboured affiduoufly to make him fensible how necessary it was that the troops should be permitted to return. The marquis, flattered with the familiarity to which he was admitted. and prompted by the view of advancing his credit with the king, yielded at last to the prince's solicitations, and then employed his influence with the States fo effectually, that they not only confented to the return of the forces, but even petitioned the king for it in the most earnest terms f.

Nothing could be more acceptable to Philip than this application, and orders were immediately fent to Italy for the march of four regiments of veterans, confifting of near ten thousand men; who,

f Bentivoglio, p. 258,

PHILLIP IS, SUPER OF SPILEN Mrs. Property and a fermion for the Control Support Services and the first control of the f Carrier Secretaria de la Sec idhe, la leòga se fo, a se per the day had been comed to precise the and loop and great the same of the hely, and a pure of their majority continues in Fried. all sale Verlage, was to be the see that Entra Service See West Cook had be not Cook Cooking S. Nort, Order, as front size party कि सम्बोधी के बना में के प्रथम करेंग्रे के and then he and farge to Brailia. See the local providings in a country of the feather, and the deficulty of fining the providings in a country which had been to long the least of war, obliged has to delike from his attempt, and to put he troops into singer-quarters;

THE United States, on the other hand, differ and an tered great shares and real as importing their new citishshed government. They mainly their reservoir from two realizes from hundred thousand, to four mellions of guiddens, with which they maintained, besides their native traces a confiderable number of British, French, and German forces. But to great a proportion of their forces was necessary for defending the forts and towns, that no surry could be afferthed fafficient to contend with the enemy is the field, not even to raile the fiege of any of male places which the prince of Parma anempted to induc. Thus the number of towns belonging to the confidences was duly diminished, while their acquistions was forward inconfiderable. And, as the enemy was more much more form that they before, they were

HISTORY OF THE REIGN OF

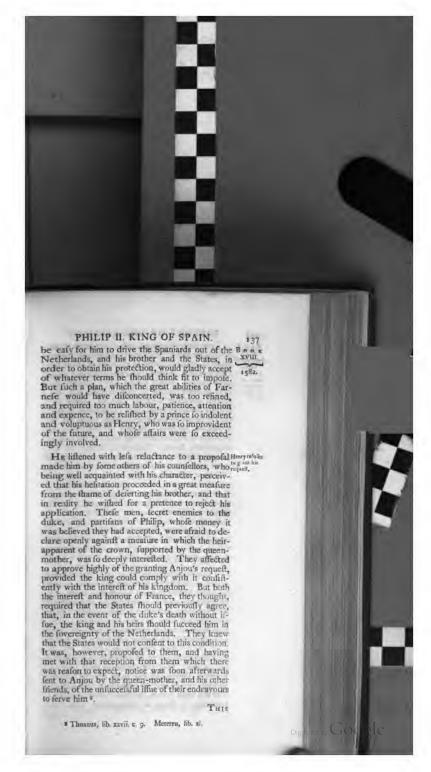

1582.

136

Book filled with the most disquieting apprehensions when they looked forward to the opening of a new campaign. Anjou, who participated with them in the anxiety which fo critical a fituation was eits affidance fitted to excite, did every thing in his power to procure from France the fuccours which he had given them reason to expect. After many delays, the duke de Montpensier and mareschal Biron arrived in the Netherlands in the end of November, with between seven and eight thousand men, partly Swiss and partly French. With this reinforcement, under so able a general as Biron, Anjou perceived that he might retard the progress of the prince of Parma's arms, but that he could not hope either to expel him from his new conquests, or to bring the war to a conclusion: he therefore renewed his folicitations at the court of France. and endeavoured to engage his brother more heartily to espouse his cause.

Henry's deliberations.

HENRY's counsellors were much divided in their opinions with regard to the measures proper to be pursued on this occasion. By some of them, the present opportunity was represented as the happiest that could offer for uniting the Netherlands to the crown of France. But, as these men did not intend to advance the interest of Anjou, they did not employ any argument addressed to Henry's friendship or generosity; and instead of exhorting him to afford his brother aid sufficient to establish himself securely in his new sovereignty, they advised him only to give him such assistance as might enable him to stop the progress of the Spanish arms. To this counsel they subjoined, that Henry ought to maintain a fleet in the Channel, and an army on the frontier of Luxemburg, in order to prevent the prince of Parma from receiving supplies from Spain or Italy. And in this potture, they said, he ought to wait, without exposing his troops to the hazards of war, till the contending parties should exhaust their strength, when it would

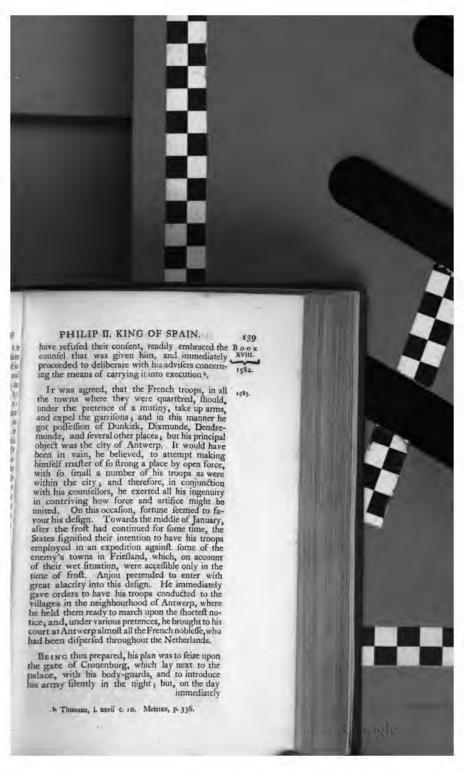

HISTORY OF THE REIGN OF

Book 1 582. tempt on Antwerp and other places.

138

This disappointment, which rendered it impossible for him to fulfil the expectations of his new subjects, was calculated to give him the most sen-Anjou's at- fible concern. A candid and grateful prince would have thought himself bound more strongly than ever to exert himself in their behalf; and, by a careful attention to their interests, joined to a faithful discharge of his other obligations, to atone for his failure in that engagement which he was Widely different were the unable to perform. sentiments which arose in the mind of the faithless ungenerous Anjou. Apprehensive that the Flemings, difgusted on account of their disappointment in those hopes of assistance with which they had been deluded, might withdraw their allegiance from him, and reconcile themselves to their former sovereign; he resolved to prevent them from executing this delign, in case they should conceive it, and in violation of all the oaths which he had fworn so lately, he formed a plan of depriving them of their liberty, by making himself master of all the towns into which his troops had already found, or could by force or stratagem find admission.

> This strange design, it is said, was first suggested to him by his partisans in France, in order to induce Henry to grant him the assistance which he folicited; and it was strongly recommended by Fervaques, and other French nobility who had accompanied him to the Netherlands. men were all real or pretended friends to Anjou, and affected to be deeply concerned for his honour, with which they perfuaded him, that fuch a limited authority as he possessed was utterly incompatible. Had they been his most inveterate enemies, they could not have advised him to a measure more likely to prove fatal to his interest. Yet this weak prince, without communicating his intention to Biron or Monpensier, who would have

r 483.

Book immediately preceding, an obscure report of his intention was circulated among the citizens, and a general alarm excited. The prince of Orange and the magistrates thought it proper to inform the duke of this report, and proposed to hang up lights in the city, and to stretch chains across the streets and gates, in order to quiet the apprehenfions of the people. Anjou could not, without confirming the juspicions entertained against him. refuse his consent to this proposal; but as he posfessed a considerable share of his mother's duplicity and artifice, he assumed with so much seeming fincerity, the appearance of indignation against the authors of the report, accompanied with such strong professions of attachment to the Netherlands in general, and the city of Antwerp in particular, that not only the magistrates, but even the prince of Orange was almost persuaded of his innocence. The streets however were barricaded. the whole town was illuminated, and many of the citizens were under arms.

> THESE circumstances having made it necessary for Anjon to change his plan, he went early next morning to the prince of Orange's apartment in the caffle, and after informing him that he had ordered his troops to be drawn out for a general review before their departure for Friesland, he defired the prince to witness it. Whether William had still any suspicion of his design is uncertain; but he refused to accompany him, alleging the badness of the day, and the state of his wound, as an excuse for his refusal; and he advised the duke to put off the review till some future day, when the people would be entirely delivered from those apprehensions with which they were at present disquieted. Anjou pretended that he would comply with his advice, and left him; but soon afterwards he sent him notice.

tice, that, finding the day grown better, he still Book resolved to hold the review, as he had at first XVIII. directed. He then gave orders to remove the barricades in the street which leads to the gate of Ripdorp, and let out, attended with a retinue in arms, amounting to between two and three hundred men.

HE had no sooner passed the gate and the drawbridge, than his attendants fell fword in hand upon the guards, and having butchered some of them, obliged the rest to take shelter in the guard-house. The orders which he had sent to the camp had been punctually executed. The whole army was in motion, and feventeen companies of foot, fix hundred lances, and four troops of horse were at hand, and ready to enter the city. They rushed in impetuously; and having fet fire to some houses near the gate, as a fignal for the rest of the troops to hasten forward. they spread themselves over the town, crying out, " May the mass flourish: the city is taken."

THE citizens had been in some measure freed from their apprehensions, by Anjou's protestations on the evening before; but they had not been put entitely off their guard. They flew instantly to arms, and quickly formed a close compacted body, of sufficient strength to make head against the enemy. Their number was soon augmented by others, who flocked to their affiftance from every quarter of the city. None declined exposing themselves to danger, or trusted to others for their defence. They remembered the devastations which had been committed some years before by the mutinous Spaniards, and were perfuaded, that they could not now avoid a repetition of the disasters which they then suffered, by any other means, but by exerting their utmost vigour, and shewing, each man for himfelf.

PHILIP II. KING OF SPAIN.

145

Digitized by GOO

defire that they would fend him his papers, furni- Book ture, and fervants; hoping that thefe laft, who were entirely innocent of what had been done, should not fuffer any harm !.

bá

de

盔

22 MI

3

油

ě

2 ű

(8

'n,

H

p.

àl

Ř

ĕ

To this letter the fenate made no return, but referred it to the confideration of the prince of Orange and the States; and in the mean time Anion being utterly destitute of every thing necessary for the support of his troops, left Berchem and directed his march towards Dendremonde, He intended to have gone thither by the shortest road, but the citizens of Antwerp having fent a number of armed veffels to oppose his passage over the Scheld, he was obliged to turn back, and to fetch a compais round by Duffel, Mechlin, Rimenant, and Vilvorden. In this march, besides suffering the greatest hardships in his own person, he loft a confiderable number of his troops by an inundation of the river Nethe. From Duffel he wrote letters to the governors of Bruffels, and other places, in which he threw the whole blame of what had happened on the inhabitants of Antwerp, and represented the affair as a tumult, in which his troops, when upon their way to the camp, had interfered, but which had arisen in confequence of the ill usage which he himself had received. This difingenuous conduct ferved to exasperate the peuple of Antwerp more than ever against him, and they published a vindication of their conduct, fet-ting forth, "That they had in all respects demeaned themselves towards him as became good and faithful subjects. They had given him even more than their proportion of the supplies, and had raised the sum of seventy thousand guilders; which, inflead of applying it to pay the arrears due to the army, he had diffributed among his French and Swifs troops to encourage them in their VOL. IL L

1583.

deracy; and no person had a juster ground of pro- Book vocation. It was by his means chiefly that Anjou had obtained the fovereignty; and yet it could not be doubted, that in fending Fervaques with troops to the castle, as above related, the intention was to deprive him either of his life or his liberty. Notwithstanding this, William had at first interposed to prevent the citizens from using any violence against the prisoners; and he now gave the following conciliatory advice to the States in writing, as he generally did in matters which he deemed of high importance.

"IT was not, he faid, without reluctance, that he had resolved to deliver his opinion on the difficult question which was now before them, as it had of late been the practice of many persons to blame him for every misfortune that had befallen the confederacy. Even if he had been invested with absolute authority, their censure would have been unjust, since the issues of things belong to God only, and no man can answer for the success of the best concerted enterprise. Considering his age, and the injustice with which he had been treated, it would be prudent perhaps not to expose himself again to the obloquy of his detractors. But his concern for the prosperity of the Netherlands would not fuffer him to maintain that filence, which a regard to his personal ease and security required; especially as they had assured him that they would take in good part, and interpret favourably, whatever counsel he should offer.

"Nothing was farther from his intention than to attempt to justify that atrocious violence which had been lately perpetrated: on the contrary, he thought the conduct of the duke had been such as proved beyond a possibility of doubt, that he L 2

Book XVIII. had forfeited his title to the fovereignty. withstanding this, no person, he believed, who fuffered himself to consider attentively the course of events fince their first connexion with the duke. would deny that this connexion had been attended with advantages. By his troops, not only the fiege of Cambray, but that of Lochem too, had been raised, and the whole province of Guelderland thereby faved from the depredations of the enemy. In consequence of his election, peace had been established between the catholics and protestants in France, and the latter left at liberty to enter into the service of the States. Not to mention what they ought perhaps to prize more than any thing elfe, that, by electing the duke for their fovereign, not only the authority, but the name and arms of Spain, had been abolished in the Netherlands, and a foundation laid, upon which their liberty might be firmly established, provided they should exert themselves with their wonted zeal and vigour. When these things were considered, there would not appear much ground for the censures passed on those by whom the duke's election had been promoted. But whether they had judged wifely or unwifely, the States must now resolve either to make peace with the king of Spain, or trust for the future to their own strength, or enter into terms of accommodation with the duke.

"WITH regard to the first of these, he observed, that besides that all the same reasons still subsisted against returning under the Spanish yoke, which had formerly determined them to shake it off; it must appear preposterous to think of reconciling themselves as subjects, to a prince, whose name and ensigns were obliterated, and whose authority they had so solemnly renounced. There was truth in what some persons (friends of Spain more than their native country) had suggested, that it was more defirable for the people of the Book Low Countries to be subject to a distant, than to a neighbouring prince, as it must be more difficult for the former, than for the latter to encroach upon their liberty. But this maxim could not, in the present divided state of the Netherlands, be urged in favour of the dominion of the king of Spain; who, besides passessing a powerful army ready to overwhelm them, was absolute master of several of the provinces; and was therefore, in reality, much nearer to the confederacy than any other prince.

XVIII. 1583.

"PROMPTED by this and other confiderations. they had bestowed the sovereignty on the duke of Anjou; and be, it could not be denied, had forfeited his title to it. This was acknowledged even by the duke himself, who was now sensible of his folly. But notwithstanding his repentance, there was much ground to doubt of the expediency of entering into a fecond agreement with one by whom the first had been so grossly violated. There was ground to dread that the same evil counsellors. by whom the duke had been once deluded, might again deceive him; and there was reason to sufpect, that confidence could not be foon restored between the French troops and the people of the Netherlands.

"On the other hand, he thought it his duty to call their attention to the consequences which must attend their refusing to be pacified. The duke would deliver all the fortified towns which he posfelled, into the hands of the Spaniards. Both he and his brother, the king of France, would from friends be converted into the most bitter enemies; from whom all that mischief might be expected. that can be contrived and executed by those who are stimulated by ambition, and inflamed with animolity and refentment. An immediate stop would be put by the French king, to their commerce with his subjects; and while he would shut

Digitized by bis oogle

Book XVIII. his harbours against their ships, he would open a passage through his dominions for the troops of the king of Spain. Even the queen of England, though highly diffatisfied with the duke's conduct, yet were she to be informed that the States had obstinately refused to be reconciled, would be exceedingly offended. And if they should lose her favour, as well as that of France, to what other friend could they have recourse, either able or willing to support them? They must for the future trust for their preservation entirely to them-They must, without delay, make a numerous augmentation of their forces; and yet he knew not where there forces could be raised, since the devastation of the war had been so great in every province of the confederacy, that scarcely a fufficient number of the people remained, to carry on their trade and manufactures. In order to maintain fuch an army as was necessary, much larger fums of money were requisite, than had hitherto been collected. What these were, would appear from the scheme which he now delivered to them, containing a particular description of all the ordinary and extraordinary expences of the war. From the difficulty which they had experienced in procuring money for paying the garrisons alone, they might judge whether they were possessed of funds adequate to the expence both of these and of an army in the field; without which, it was impossible that they could for any considerable time resist the enemy.

"He was far from censuring those who advised them to trust to the Almighty for protection. The counsel of these persons was pious and well intended; but he thought, that to engage in any difficult enterprise without the means of carrying it into execution, was more properly to tempt the Divine Providence than to trust in it; and that those only could be said to exercise a proper trust in God, who, after embracing the most favourable opportunities of action, had recourse to Hea- Book ven by prayer, to crown their undertakings with fuccels. It behoved them therefore still attentively to consider their strength and their resources; and if, without foreign affiftance, they should find them sufficient for the purposes which they had in view, they would, in his opinion, judge wifely in resolving to retain the sovereignty in their own hands.

"THERE was a time when the people of the Netherlands might have established themselves in this happy state of freedom and independence; when, in spite of the king of Spain, they might have expelled his brother John of Austria from the provinces. But our present situation, continued William, is widely different from what it was at the time of which I speak. A powerful Spanish army, feconded by those who were then our friends, is at The strength of the confederacy is our gates. impaired. Even with the affiftance of the French troops, we have been unable to flop the progress of the enemy. If nevertheless you shall, upon inquiry, find that you are able, by making greater exertions, to do more alone, than when you were affifted by others, banish for ever all thoughts of an accommodation with the duke, and refolve henceforth, alone and unaffisted, to oppose both him and the Spaniards. Proceed instantly to the execution of your defign. But I dread that before you can make the preparations necessary for entering upon action, before you can collect either the troops or the money requifite, and even before you can appoint a general to command your forces, many of your towns will be taken; and many of them despairing of relief, will enter into terms of accommodation with the Spaniards. reasons you will judge, perhaps, that in your prefent circumstances the wifest resolution which you can form, is to enter into a treaty of reconcilement with the duke. And if this shall be the refult XVIII. 1583.

fult of your deliberations, I have only one other Book counsel to suggest, which is, to give particular attention in your new agreement to prevent the fortified towns from being exposed on any future occasion to that danger from which the city of Antwerp has so narrowly escaped; and for this purpose to require, that no officer or soldier shall be admitted into garrisons without taking an oath of allegiance and fidelity to the States "."

Reconcilement of the Anjou. March 8th.

This reasoning of the prince of Orange pro-States with duced the defired effect upon a great majority of the deputies, and a negociation was immediately begun, and foon afterwards a treaty of peace and reconciliation was concluded on the following conditions: That all the French prisoners in Antwerp should be set at liberty, the duke's papers and other effects restored, and ninety thousand guilders given him for discharging the arrears due to his troops. That he should deliver up all the towns which he had seized, retire to Dunkirk with four hundred foot and three hundred horse, and remain there till every point of difference should be entirely settled; that he should renew the oath which he took at his inauguration, to govern the provinces according to the fundamental laws, and that all his troops should take an oath of allegiance to the States, binding themselves to ferve them faithfully against their enemies, and never to be concerned in any attempt to the prejudice of their authority.

Attempts en Orange.

As in promoting this agreement the prince of the life of the Orange appears to have acted under a conviction, that there was no other expedient by which the confederacy could be faved from ruin; so, in being able to persuade the States to adopt it, he gave the most convincing proof of his unlimited The people in geinfluence over that affembly. neral.

9 Van Meteren and Thuanua.

1583.

neral, especially in Flanders and Brabant, were Book extremely averse from all accommodation. Their xviii. hereditary antipathy against the French had, on this occasion, risen to the greatest height. of the deputies too were animated with the same aversion and refentment; nor can it be doubted. that if they had not been prevented by that deference which they had been long accustomed to entertain for William's opinion, they would have proceeded against Anjou to the utmost extremities. and have resolved never more to acknowledge his authority. The Spaniards were not ignorant by whom the States had been prevented from forming this resolution; and they were now convinced. that, till the prince of Orange were removed, no event, however promising, would induce the confederates to return to their allegiance. They had recourse therefore to the dishonourable means of private affassination; and to attempt it, different persons were instigated about this time by Philip or his ministers; one of them by Philip him:eif. according to the declaration of the criminal; but more probably, by his ministers at Madrid: another by his ambassador at the court of France: and a third by the marquis de Roubais and the prince of Parma. The conspiracy of the two former was detected, and they suffered death; and the last, a French officer, whom Rotba's had taken prisoner, and who had pretended to agree to the proposal, in order to procure his liberty, gave information to William's friends of the arguments which had been employed to perfiade him, and shewed by his conduct afterwards in the fervice of the States, the fincerity of his abhorrence of that unhallowed deed which he had been for licited to perform.

THE

P Meteren, p. 348.

Book XVIII. 1583.

THE danger to which the prince was so often exposed from the inveterate resentment of the Spaniards, ought to have endeared his person and Discontents counsels to his countrymen, and they produced of the people this effect in a high degree upon all those who were able to comprehend the wildom and moderation with which he had conducted their affairs. But great numbers having formed their judgment of Anjou's election to the fovereignty, from the late unhappy consequences with which it had been accompanied, could not refrain from ascribing fome linister intention to those who had been active in promoting it. They were incapable of discerning the strength of the motives by which William had been prompted to advise the States to renew their agreement, and they even fostered fuspicions of his having attached himself to the duke, with a view to some private advantage. This spirit of discontent was not confined to the vulgar, but likewise infected several of the deputies of the States, who became fullen and refractory; and by their contentious opposition to almost every measure that was proposed, disturbed and retarded the deliberations of that affembly. A great majority however of the members agreed to employ the French and Swiss troops under mareschal Biron, whom the duke had appointed to command them. Biron having not only had no concern in the attempt upon Antwerp, but having been considered by Anjou as one by whom it would have been opposed, was the most unexceptionable person to whom the command could have been committed, and he had been long diftinguished for his military skill and experience. At first his arms were attended with success. compelled the fort of Wouda to furrender, and with inferior forces he repulsed the prince of Parma, who had attacked his lines near the town of Rolendal. But it was impossible for him with so small an army to stop the progress of the Spaniards

Spaniards in other places, or to face them in the Book open field. Farnese therefore pushed his conquests with great rapidity, and made himself master of Endove, Diest, and Westerlo, while he practised every art of negociation and intrigue against Bruges, Ghent, and other places.

XVIII. 1583.

DURING the course of these transactions the duke of Anjou fell into a lingering illness at Dunkirk, which was generally supposed to be the effect of those hardships which he suffered in his retreat from Antwerp. Whether he believed himself infecure in his present situation, while the prince of Parma was so briskly carrying on his conquests in the neighbourhood, or found that his health required a change of air, and a relaxation from the fatigues of business, or whether he had conceived hopes at this time of obtaining, by a personal interview with his brother, more powerful assistance than he had hitherto received, does not appear with sufficient evidence. But whatever was the motive which determined him, he left Dunkirk and fet out for France.

THE prince of Parma was no fooner informed Progress of of his departure, than he quitted Herentals, and the prince of led his troops to Dunkirk. The States, aware of arms. the importance of that place, ordered marshal Biron to march with all his forces to its relief. But fuch was the resentment which the Ghentese and other Flemings had conceived against the French, that no confideration could prevail upon them to fuffer Biron to pass through their terri-They had resolved, they said, never to accede to the late agreement with the duke, whom they could not trust, and they would not be indebted to his troops for their defence. The consequence to be expected followed. The garrison of Dunkirk, which confisted wholly of French, gave up the town in a few days to the prince of Parma.

Digitized by Google

Book Parma. He then laid fiege to Nieuport, and took it with so much facility, as gave ground for a suspicion of treachery on the part of the garrison. He intended next to have invested Ostend, but having learnt that the prince of Orange had taken particular pains to provide for its fecurity, he relinquished his design; and having turned his arms against Dixmude and Meningen, he subdued these and several other places with a degree of celerity with which the people of the Netherlands had never been accustomed to see any military enterprifes carried on. But his success served only to dazzle and confound the confederates, instead of opening their eyes to the fatal confequences of that discord which had exposed so great a number of their affociates an easy prey to the Spaniards, Except augmenting the garrifons of two or three towns, in the preservation of which some of the deputies were personally interested, no vigorous resolution of any consequence was formed by the States, although they held their fessions daily, and were daily alarmed with fresh accounts of some new loss which the confederacy had fustained.

Injurious futpicions against the prince of Orange.

ABOUT this time an incident fell out at Antwerp which strongly marks the spirit by which the Flemings were actuated on this occasion. The prince of Orange having given orders for building an additional rampart for the greater security of the castle, some secret partisans of Spain took occasion from thence to infinuate, that he intended to deliver that fortress to the French, and was now preparing it for their reception. too easily believed this injurious suggestion; and having taken up arms, they ran tumultuoufly to the castle, with a resolution to expel the garrison. William immediately presented himself before them. The fight of a person whom they had been so long accustomed to revere, joined to the evidence evidence which they received on the spot, of the Book utter falsehood of that report which they had so xviii. rathly credited, appealed the fury of the greater number, and quelled the tumult. But there were fome among them more audacious and malignant than the rest, who called him by the contumelious names of deferter and traitor of his country. This treatment, so unmerited from a people whom he had faved from ruin, affected him in the most senfible manner. He admonished the magistrates to take cognifance of the licentiousness which they had witnessed; but finding, that, on account of the great number of the guilty, they were afraid to exercise their authority, he left Antwerp, and retired into Zealand, after having delivered direc-He retires tions to the magistrares in writing, for the go-July 22. vernment and defence of the city, and nominated the Sieur de St. Aldegonde, chief magistrate, or governor, for the enfuing year 4.

WILLIAM did not intend by changing the place of his residence to withdraw his attention from the fouthern provinces. He interested himfelf as much as ever in their affairs, and meant only to provide for his own fecurity, and to remove the affembly of the States (which was summoned to meet at Middleburg) to a fituation in which the deputies would not be so much influenced by the emissaries of Spain, nor so much disturbed in their

4 Of the affection of the maritime provinces towards the prince of Orange, and of the trust and considence which they reposed in him, he received about this time a conspicuous proof, by a resolution into which all the cities entered, except two, of creating him earl of Holland and Zealand, with all the powers and privileges which belonged to that ancient dignity. How far the prince himself contributed to their forming this resolution, coes not appear from the cotemporary historians. It did not contradict the treaty between the United States and the duke of Anjou; as, by that treaty, the maritime provinces had only bound themselves to contribute their share of the public expences. Yet it was matter of some obloquy against the prince, of whom it was faid, that he had not been inattentive to his private interest. Digitized by Google 1583.

Book their deliberations by the tumultuous disposition of the people. He still employed all his interest to reconcile the cities of Brabant and Flanders to the continuance of the French troops in the Netherlands. And his endeavours proved effectual with Bruffels, and some other towns which lav nearest to the enemy; but Ghent, and most of the other cities, remained as inflexible as ever, and resolved never to admit the French within their territories, or to be indebted to them for protection. The States therefore found it necesfary to give orders for the departure of these troops, at a time when every friend of his country, who suffered himself to reflect on the critical situation of the confederacy, thought that the provinces ought rather to have made concessions to Anjou and the French king, in order to induce the latter to augment their number. Biron put them on board transports at Biervliet, and thence August 27. conducted them by fea to France.

THE Spaniards were now at liberty to purfue their conquests almost without opposition. Farnese immediately formed the blockade of Ipres. Alost was fold to him by an English and Walloon garrison for the payment of their arrears. country of Waes, and the town of Ruplemonde on the Scheld, were subdued, and Zutphen too was taken by surprise; the consequence of which was, that the Veluwe, an extensive territory between the Issel and the Rhine, was laid open to the incursions of the enemy.

In the mean time the fecret partifans of Spain were daily increasing in Bruges, Ghent, and other places. Many persons had declared themselves against Anjou with so much violence, that they dreaded his return. Many were intimidated by the rapidity of the prince of Parma's conquests. Some having been intrusted with the public money. were afraid of being called to account for their management of it by the prince of Orange and the the States, and all of them were allured to their Book first allegiance by the moderation with which XVIII. Farnese treated such as had already submitted to him, and the strict fidelity with which be adhered to his engagements.

Digitized by Google

1583.

Among the persons, who, prompted by these motives, were defirous of again reducing their country under the Spanish government, the prince of Orange had the mortification to find his brother-in-law, count Heremberg. This nobleman, weak, inconstant, and governed by his wife, who was the prince's fifter, but had for some time been at variance with her brother, had formed the design of delivering the province of Guelderland, of which he had been appointed governor, into the hands of the Spaniards. His plot having been detected before it was ripe for execution, he was feized and imprisoned by an order of the States. But having been afterwards fet at liberty upon his parole, he gave irrefragable proof of his guilt by flying over to the enemy.

THE prince of Chimai's intrigues in Flanders Treachery were more successful. This nobleman, eldest son of Chimais of the duke D'Arschot, had been educated in the catholic faith, but some time before the present period, he had openly professed the reformed religion, and attached himself with much apparent zeal to the party of the prince of Orange and the States. Conscious that both his religion and patriotism were mere grimace, he had laboured with confummate artifice to remove any suspicions that might be entertained of his fincerity. He was perpetually furrounded with the protestant minifters, with whom he lived on the most familiar terms; and he published an apology for his conduct, in which, with the highest encomiums on the protestant faith, he mingled the bitterest invectives against Philip, bestowing on him every

Digitized by Google

reproachful

fake of his religion. By this fictitious account of Book his extraction, joined to an artful affectation of. zeal for the reformed religion and the service of the States, he became known to the prince; and William was so far deceived by this impostor, that he put him into the train of an ambassador to the court of France. This mark of confidence did not divert him from his ungenerous defign; on the contrary, he had no fooner returned from France than he refolved to carry it into execution a and he would have done fo, as he afterwards declared, on his first arrival, when he was admitted with letters into the prince's apartment, if he had not neglected to furnish himself with arms. But in a few days after, having returned to the palace, on the pretence of applying for a passport, he placed himself at the door of that apartment, in which the prince was at dinner with his wife Louisa de Cologni, and his fister the countess of Scwartzenburg, and waited there, with a cloak cast round him, till they were retiring into another room. The princess, observing him look confused and pale, was grealy alarmed, and enquired what he wanted. He comes for a passport, answered the prince; when the affaffin, stepping forward, shot him in the body with a pistol loaded with three balls. William had time only to fay, "God have mercy on me, and this afflicted people: I am grievously wounded." Immediately after which he fell down, and in a few moments afterwards expired 4, the princess, overwhelmed with July 10thanguish, looking on; whose peculiar fate it was to see her second husband murdered, as her illustrious father, and her first husband, the amiable Teligni, had been, in the massacre of Paris, some years before.

M 2

THE

In the fifty-fecond year of his age.

HISTORY OF THE REIGN OF Book XVIII.

164

The murderer, in the mean time had made his escape out of the palace by a back-door, and had almost reached the ramparts. He was preparing to throw himself into the ditch, which was full of water, in the hopes of being able to swim over, when he was overtaken by two of the prince's guards.

Upon his first examination he declared, that, six years before the present period, he had formed the design of putting the prince to death; that he had then been deterred from his purpose by his friends; that he had again resumed it, when the king published his edict of proscription; that having been in the service of Du Pré, secretary to count Mansveldt, he had procured from him some blank subscriptions of the count's, which, in order to gain credit, he had delivered to the prince; that he had communicated his design to four jesuits in Treves and Tournay, who assured him, that if he should die in the execution of it, he would be deemed a martyr by the church.

To these circumstances, after the torture was applied, he subjoined, that the reward promised in the profcription had been his principal motive; that he had made known his purpose to the prince of Parma, and had been advised by him to converse with his secretary, Christopher Assonville: that Assonville had desired him to reflect on the difficulties which he must encounter; but had affured him, that he could not perform a more acceptable service either to the king or the prince of Parma; that he might depend, with perfect fecurity, upon receiving the money promifed in the king's edict of proscription; but exhorted him repeatedly to deny, in case of his being seized, that the prince of Parma had approved of his defign; although the prince, he faid, had in reality approved of it, and had confented to his using the blank subscriptions.

1584.

WHEN he was informed of the sentence pro- Book nounced against him, in which it was ordained, that his right hand should be burnt off, and the flesh of his body torn from the bones with burning pincers, he was at first thrown into the most dreadful consternation, and lamented bitterly that he had suffered the thirst of wealth to betray him into an action, which had plunged him into fuch intolerable misery; but he soon recovered his natural fortitude, and faid, that, far from repenting of what he had done, he was conscious of having merited the favour of God, and was fure of being admitted into a state of eternal happiness. And in this temper of mind he remained, both in the interval before his execution, and the time of it, during which he exhibited a degree of composure and tranquillity that filled the spectators with astonishment.

THE highest encomiums were bestowed on this deluded wretch by the popish ecclesiastics in the fouthern provinces; and in many cities they would have lighted up bonfires, and celebrated public rejoicings, if the confent of the people could have been obtained; but even the prince of Parma's troops refused to join in these rejoicings, and openly declared their condemnation of an act, which they found repugnant to the dictates of their hearts, whatever might be said in justification of it, on the principles of crooked politics, or the popish faith.

THE reader will not need being told of the grief and consternation, which this melancholy event diffused throughout the confederated provinces. Each person mourned as for his parent, his guardian, and friend, and felt for the loss which the State had sustained, as men are wont to feel for their private and domestic calamities. Being now deprived of the person whose wisdomhad, for many years, been their principal support, the prince.

B o o k they considered themselves as destitute and forlorn, and were overwhelmed with the most gloomy 1584. apprehensions of their future fate r.

NEVER was any person better fitted than the Character of prince of Orange for the difficult fituation in which he was placed, or better qualified for the arduous talk of delivering an injured people from the yoke of their oppressor. Even his bitterest enemies allow him to have been possessed of vigilance. application, penetration, and fagacity, joined with a peculiar dexterity in governing the inclinations of men, and in conciliating and preserving their affections. To these accomplishments both the history of his life, and the testimony of the best informed historians, authorise us to add the virtues of fortitude and magnanimity, of justice and equity, of patience, equanimity, and moderation, which were never perhaps found united in one person in so eminent a degree. Amidst all the variety of fortune which he experienced, he was never either elated or depressed; but whether the events in which he was interested were prosperous or adverse, he preserved on all occasions the same composure and serenity of soul.

> By a respectable popish historian, he is accused of avarice and rapacity, yet that author has not been able to produce a fingle fact to justify his charge. It appears not from any historian, that he was ever guilty of employing his power for the purpose of advancing his private interest to the prejudice either of individuals or the public. always declined taking any concern in administering the finances. He did not even exact payment of the revenue which the States had appointed him; and at his death he left his private affairs fo much encumbered, that the States found it Book necessary to make provision for the support of xviii. his widow and children ".

Van Meteren, p. 363. Bentivoglio, lib. xii. Thuanus hoc anno. • Thuani Historia. • Bentivoglio. in hoc anno. Bentivoglio.

1584:

THE same historian has loaded him with the imputation of fraud and hypocrify, of which however no proof was ever given but general invective. nor a fingle instance of deceit produced by his most inveterate enemies. Before his rupture with Philip, he testified on all occasions his disapprobation of the measures that were pursued; and after it, he acted uniformly the part of an open foe. He had no religion, say some catholic writers, but what his interest and ambition dictated. Yet he was decent and irreproachable in his conduct, as well as punctual in discharging the functions of that religion which he professed; nor do these authors pretend to offer any other evidence to justify their surmise, but that he gave up the catholic religion, in which he had been educated at the court of the emperor, and returned to that with which his mind had been tinctured in his earliest infancy. His religion was not indeed of the same spirit either with that of those whom he forfook, or of many of those whose cause he adopted. It fuffered him not to regard either speculative opinions or external rights, as sufficient ground for harassing and butchering those from whom he differed in opinion. But in an age of cruel gloomy superstition, with which almost all the companions of his youth were deeply infected, his religion, conformably to the example and precepts of its author, was mild, moderate, and humane. Nor was it to one fect of Christians only that his moderation and humanity extended. he did what he could while he adhered to the catholic faith to put a stop to the persecution of the protestants; so after he had embraced the reformed

Wickfort, lib. ii.

168

1584.

Book reformed religion, he exerted his most strenuous endeavours to protect the catholics from violence. and to procure liberty for them to exercise their religion as far as was consistent with the public peace. To infer from this conduct, that he had no religion of his own, is going a great deal farther than to affert the lawfulness of persecution; it is equivalent to maintaining, that no Christian can be fincere who can live at peace with those who differ from him in his religious persuasion.

> IT is not to the purpose which the popish histo-. rians intended to serve by their portraits of William's character, to say of him that he was ambitious: in itself, ambition merits neither praise nor blame, but is culpable or laudable according to the end at which it aspires, and the means which it employs. But if we judge concerning the character of the prince of Orange according to this criterion, it must be impossible for persons so opposite in their principles, as the catholic and protestant historians, to agree.

Ir with the former, we place the rights of all fovereigns on the same foundation, without distinguishing between an absolute prince and the sovereign of a free people, and believe that every prince is, by an indefeasible and divine right, intitled to exercise a despotic power over the religion and liberty of his subjects; if we believe, that with the permission of the pope, a king may violate his most solemn oaths, and that the obligations of his fubjects to obedience remain in force, even after every condition upon which they entered into them has been violated; if with fuch principles as these, we judge of the character of the prince of Orange, it will be difficult not to confider him as guilty both of perjury and rebellion; and, in this case, the most favourable verdict that can be passed upon his conduct, is to fay, that it proceeded from a criminal ambition.

Bur

HISTORY

OF THE REIGN OF

PHILIP THE SECOND. KING OF SPAIN.

BOOK XIX.

HE prince of Parma did not neglect the Book opportunity which the diffress occasioned by the death of the prince of Orange afforded him, to persuade the confederated provinces to Temper and accept of peace. But their distrust of Philip, the States. their attachment to the protestant faith, and the other causes mentioned above, still retained their influence, and rendered them averse from any reconcilement with a prince against whom their indignation was more inflamed than ever, by the cruel injury which they had lately suffered. They could attend to nothing now but how to profecute the war with vigour, or to testify their respect for the memory of the prince of Orange.

WILLIAM's eldest son, the count of Buren, Prince Masswas still a prisoner in Spain; and his second, prince Maurice was engaged in the study of literature a Grandson, by the mother's side, of the celebrated elector of Saxony of the same name.

172

Book and science at the university of Leyden. On this young man, who, at the time of his father's death, was only eighteen years old, of great hopes, and whose actions afterwards exceeded the most sanguine expectations of his countrymen, the States bestowed the greatest part of the dignities which which his father had enjoyed. Besides creating him high-admiral of the Union, they conferred upon him the government of Holland, Zealand, and Utrecht. And, in order to supply his want of experience, and secure his being early instructed in the military art, they appointed count Hohenloe, the most accomplished officer in their service, to be his lieutenant or deputy, till he should attain to greater maturity of years and understanding.

Reduction of Bruffels, Ghent, &c. 1

From this conduct of the States, which proved that William's afcendant over them had not terminated with his life, Farnese perceived that it would be impossible to bring the war to a conclufion in any other way than by force of arms. Dismissing therefore all thoughts of peace, he proceeded with great activity in the military operations which he had begun in Brabant and Flanders; and his fuccess was in proportion to the prudence and vigilance which he exerted. the towns above mentioned, he had lately acquired Vilvorden and Dendremonde, but he had not yet reduced Ghent, Brussels, Mechlin, or Antwerp. To have proceeded separately against each of these places in the ordinary way of sieges, would have protracted the war to an excessive length. Instead of that method, he bethought himself of another, which was suggested by the situation of the several towns, and the nature of their resources. This was to make himself master of the banks of the rivers and canals on which they stood, while he sent out slying parties of horse to scour the adjacent country. And thus he not only put a stop to their trade, without which they they could not subsist, but cut off all of them but Book Antwerp from every fort of communication with other places. For feveral months however the inhabitants declined entering into any terms of accommodation. But when they confidered that, unless he were obliged to draw off his troops by the approach of a superior army, they must soon be reduced to the last extremity, their resolution failed, they began to liften more patiently to the exhortations which the fecret partifans of Spain were daily founding in their ears; and, at length, fuch of them as were lituated in the more interior parts, first Ghent, and afterwards Brussels and Mechlin, resolved to return under the Spanish government, upon conditions to which Farnese had, on different occasions, shewn himself willing to agree.

Or these conditions, the most important were the following: " That the people should engage to acknowledge no other fovereign but the king of Spain: That no religion but the Roman catholic should be permitted, but that the protestants should be allowed to remain in the Netherlands for two years, in order to dispose of their effects: That a fum of money should be paid for defraying the expences of the war: That all past offences should be forgiven, and all the antient rights and privileges of the inhabitants restored and maintained inviolate."

In fulfilling his part of these conditions, Farnese not only acted with strict fidelity, but displayed a degree of lenity and moderation that was admirably calculated to promote his views. the fine of three hundred thousand crowns, to which the people of Ghent consented in their treaty of furrender, he demanded only two hundred thousand. And although in his act of indemnity fix persons, more obnoxious than the rest, had been excepted, he required from them

HISTORY OF THE REIGN OF

Book only a pecuniary fine. He was likewise at all xix. times willing to listen to the complaints of the protestants, and to redress their grievances.

174

now subdued, except Antwerp. The prince had early formed the resolution of laying siege to that important city; and some time before his acquisition of Ghent and Brussels, he had taken measures for beginning it. But in order to secure success, it was necessary that his utmost skill and strength should be exerted; and he now applied himself to the prosecution of his design, with all the anxiety, zeal, and industry, which an object of the highest consequence deserved.

ANTWERP was at this time not only the richest and most splendid, but likewise the strongest city in the Netherlands. As it lies extended along the banks of the Scheld, and the confederates still maintained their superiority at sea; it was thought to be sufficiently secured on one side by a strong wall which ran parallel to the river; and on the other sides it was fortisted by ramparts of extraordinary strength, and a ditch filled with water, of such depth and breadth, as in the opinion of those times rendered it almost impregnable.

Such was the judgment formed of it by the prince of Parma, and on this account he did not intend to attempt reducing it by storm, but to have recourse to the slower method of blockade, which he knew must sooner or later prove successful.

On the fide towards the land, he found it extremely easy to render the blockade complete, as the States had no army able to contend with him in the field, and all the neighbouring towns were in

HISTORY OF THE REIGN OF

Book terfere with his plan for putting a stop to the naxix. vigation of their river.

1584.

176

For this reason, instead of pushing the immediatere duction of it, he was satisfied with blockading it on the land-side, so as to prevent the excursions of the garrisons.

The printe of Parma's plan for blocking up the Scheld.

Having given instructions for this purpose, he called a council of his general officers, and laid before them his project for blockading up the Scheld, by building a bridge over it, to intercept the communication between the besieged city and the maritime provinces; an enterprise which, had it failed, would have exposed him to derision, but which shewed the boldness of his genius, and has contributed more than almost any other of his military atchievements, to raise his character to that exalted rank which it holds in the annals of history.

By most of the officers this proposal was regarded as chimerical. For where, said they, can materials be found for so great an undertaking? And even if they should be found, yet how is it possible to transport them hither? By land-carriage, it is utterly impracticable; nor would it feem to be much easier by water, while the enemy possesses so great a superiority in naval force. Besides that, no beams, they observed, were of sufficient length to reach the bottom of the river.

To build a bridge of ships, they thought, would be equally impracticable, because he did not possess so great a number as was necessary, and it would be impossible to collect them from different places, in the face of a vigilant enemy, of superior merit and strength. And even allowing it were possible, either with beams or ships to construct such a bridge as was projected, yet it would be quickly destroyed by the ice, or by the tides and storms, or by the enemy.

178.

XIX.

In order to avoid the repetition of this disaster, Farnese made, on the Flanders side near Borcht, which stands higher than Antwerp, a large cut in the dike of the Scheld, by which he laid all the neck of land between Borcht and Caloo under water; opening an egress for the water by another cut near Caloo, and transporting his apparatus for the bridge across the inundation. This expedient rendered it unnecessary for his boats to pass by Antwerp, and they likewise arrived sooner at their destined port.

Bur St. Aldegonde having built a redoubt on the Brabant aide, opposite to the cut at Borcht, and stationed some armed vessels to cruize there, soon rendered the passage as difficult as before. nese was therefore obliged to adopt another expedient, much more laborious than the former; but which he knew would certainly be attended with fuccess. This was to dig a canal fifteen Italian miles in length, to join the inundation just now mentioned, with a little river which falls into the Scheld at Ghent. That he might finish this arduous undertaking the more speedily, he fixed his head-quarters at Beveren, in the neighbourhood of the canal, and was perpetually prefent himself, exhorting and encouraging the workmen; and fometimes taking the spade and pick-axe into his own hand. The work was finished with wonderful expedition, and fully answered his expectation. As the enemy could have no access either to the canal, or the river with which it communicated. he conveyed all necellary materials and engines from Ghent without opposition and immediately afterwards began the construction of the bridge.

Bescription

THE two extremities of this ediffice were formed of the bridge of huge beams, driven into the bottom of the river by the force of engines, and strongly bound together by other transverseor cross beams. This part pet of the work point the haraba or ethouses, na him and this of the own love to be made. of it, to far as the depth of the water would alone, which on the Funder falls was two hos-dailful, and in the other, my bushed. Their Ranks were only trebe first broad, eroops mounts the two extremities, some the center of the river, where their breadth being controlled to forty feet, two lars were medical count (horse, and furnished with artillery. The whole was covered at top with throng planks, and a pursues five feet high, of the trickest planks, was miled upon it file the fecurity of the foldiers. A more of piles was then driven deep into the bottom of the men, pemilel to each fide of the flucadity, at the distance of a few feet from them, and dramply fathered to the bearps of which they were composed. Besides which, another row of long beams, pointed with from was placed berizontally a little above the forface of the water, firetching out to a confiderable length from the bridge on both fales, so as to make it dangerous for thips to approach.

THILLP E. BING OF SPAIN.

墨

By this part of the work, the ravigation of the river was confiderably firaitened; but as there was un open space in the middle, between the heads of the efficacies, of more than one thousand two hundred and fifty feet, the enemy's thips taking advangtage fometimes of the night, and fometimes of the wind and fide, continued, though not without lofs, to pais and repais as formerly; and the city was full abundantly supplied with provisions. Furnese having from the beginning intended to fill up the intermediate space with thips, had with great difficulty collected two and thirty, which he nulged to be a fufficient number. These vessels, after the mafts had been taken out, were placed with their fides parallel to each other, at the diflance of about twenty feet. They were firengly fastened together by chains, and were fixed in their 180 their places by anchors at both ends, in such a manner that the sailors could shorten or lengthen the cables, as the tide either rose or fell. Over the intermediate spaces, strong beams went from one ship to another. Above these were laid planks; and the same fort of parapet was erected, as that which was raised on the stacados. Thirty soldiers and four sailors were put on board each ship, and all the ships were planted with artillery.

Book XIX. 1584.

1585.

For the greater security of this part of the work, a flota one thousand two hundred seet long was constructed of barks, bound together in the same manner as the ships of which the bridge was formed, with the same sort of beams pointed with iron, resembling a file of pikes, stretching from that end of the barks which lay next to the enemy. These barks were filled with empty casks, to prevent them from being sunk, and were fixed in their place by anchors. Of this kind of flota, two were constructed, consisting each of two and thirty barks, one above, and the other below the bridge, at the distance of two hundred yards.

This stupendous work of furnished employment to the prince of Parma's fleet and army for more than half a year. Without a fleet of considerable strength it could not have been executed, and the procuring of this fleet in such disadvantageous circumstances, was one of the many striking proofs which Farnese exhibited on this occasion, of that extraordinary activity and enterprise by which his character is so eminently distinguished. With infinite labour and difficulty he had equipped, at Ghent and Dunkirk, forty armed vessels, and put them under the command of the marquis de Roubais; who being well supported by the forts and redoubts on the banks of the river, protected the workmen, e It was finished February 1585.

workmen, in spite of the most vigorous efforts which the besieged could make to interrupt them.

Воок XIX.

1585.

FARNESE however would not probably have succeeded in his enterprise, if the united States had exerted themselves with vigour, proportioned either to that of the enemy, or to the importance of the prize contested. It now appeared how great was the loss which the confederacy had sustained in the death of the prince of Orange. By William's superior rank, wisdom, and experience, some turbulent leaders had been restrained, who, after his death, indulged their factious, interested spirit, without regard to the pernicious consequences which might ensue. Among these was Treslong, whom the States had appointed commander of the fleet, destined for the relief of Antwerp. This man, whether from treachery or from private resentment, paid no regard to his instructions; but on different pretences, at first delayed putting the orders of the States in execution, and at last told them that he would not fail, unless some persons with whom he had quarrelled were removed from the magistracy. On this occasion, prince Maurice called an affembly of the States of the province, dismissed Treslong from his employment, and put him under arrest. The command of the fleet was then given to count Hohenloe; but the time in which its operations might have proved effectual, was past; and the bridge, with all its fortifications, as above described, was almost finished.

No words can express the aftonishment which consternatiit excited in the minds of the besieged. At the on of the becommencement of the work, they had regarded it rather as an object of derision, than as fitted to excite any ferious apprehension or alarm. anxiety and terror now were in proportion to their former confidence and security. They saw an entire stop put to their trade in every quarter. Book They already felt many of the inconveniencies of a fiege. Their imaginations represented, in the most dreadful light, the calamities which they were about to fuffer; and persons of all ranks began to talk of the necessity of preventing them in time, by making their peace with the enemy. But they were diverted from forming any fixed resolution by St. Aldegonde, who employed all his eloquence and address to rouse their abhorrence of the Spanish yoke, and to inspire them with the hopes of being able to raise the siege.

1585.

Speech of St. Aldegonde.

" IT is not furprifing, faid he, in an affembly of those who held public offices in the town, that many of our fellow-citizens should tremble at the prospect of those hardships which usually attend a long continued fiege. But while we cast our eyes forward to these, let us reflect on the calamities which we have reason to dread from a surrender. We have feen, within these few years, two memorable fieges, the fiege of Haerlem, and that of The people of Haerlem, rather than fubmit to the last extremities, chose to throw themselves on the mercy of the Spaniards. how bitterly did they repent of their having done fo? And how much better had it been to have fallen in the field of battle, than to fuffer, as so great a number of the bravest did, that ignominious death to which they were doomed by the cruel Spaniard? The inhabitants of Leyden, on the other hand, resolved rather to die, than to deliver themselves up to such a perfidious enemy: and the consequence of their adhering to this resolution was, that the fiege was raifed, and a period put to all their miseries. Can we helitate in deciding which of these examples we ought to follow? Is not death more eligible, than submission to the dominion of an enemy, from whom we have endured fuch intolerable outrage?

Book KIK. 1585.

" Ip this city shall fall under the yoke of these oppressors, can we doubt that the citadel will be restored, and with it all the tyranny which they were wont to exercise? Will not our religion be proscribed, and the inquisition established? This illustrious city will then become a colony Spaniards. Her commerce will be ruined, and her inhabitants obliged to wander in fearch of places of abode, forlorn and indigent. But why should I thus describe the disasters of a surrender? There is still no reason for despair. It is impossible that this bridge can stand long against the efforts which we will make for its destruction. Let us not therefore be wanting to ourselves; but with a fixt, unalterable purpose, let us embrace the glorious alternative of liberty or death."

By these exhortations, joined to the respect in which his character was held, St. Aldegonde gained over the citizens to a perfect conformity with his fentiments; and perfuaded them to renew the oath which they had formerly taken, never to return under the dominion of the king of Spain. An edict was then published, prohibiting all persons, under the severest penalties, from listening to any terms of accommodation that might be offered; after which they proceeded with redoubled ardour to put in practice such expedients as had been devised for the demolition of the bridge.

In order to effectuate this, they had been for Preparations fome time past employed in preparing fire-ships, of the be-under the direction of Giambelli, a celebrated Ita-molishing lian engineer, who appears to have been the author the bridge. of this invention. They were formed of the thickest planks, and had each of them a mine or chamber

Book chamber in the middle. This mine was built in the strongest manner, and filled with gunpowder, and with rugged stones, bullets, and such other weighty materials, rammed hard and close, on purpose to increase the resistance, and augment the force of the explosion.

The citizens laboured at the same time in confiructing a flat-bottomed vessel of extraordinary strength and size, with which they intended to attack the forts and redoubts on the banks of the river. This enormous machine was more properly a floating castle than a ship, and the town's people had, on account of the sanguine expectations which they conceived from it, given it the name of the "end of the war,"

WHILE the people of Antwerp were thus employed, the confederates who lay at Lillo, under count Hohenloe, made a vigorous attack on the fort of Lieffkensoech, and compelled the garrison to furrender. From Lieffkensoech, they proceeded against another fort of the name of St. Antony, which they likewise reduced with the same facility. When intelligence was brought to the prince of Parma of their descent, he set out with a detachment of his army to oppose their progress. but both the forts had furrendered before he could arrive. Being enraged against the commanders of these forts, on account of their having made too feeble a relistance, he ordered them both to be beheaded on the dike of the Scheld, in fight of the enemy. He was the more concerned for the loss of Lieff kensoech, as it gave the enemy free possession of the navigation of the river below the bridge, and thereby tended to facilitate the execution of any design which they might form for its destruction.

Ar first he imagined that the solicitude which the confederates had shewn for the recovery of Lieffkensoech, Lieffkenflech, had proceeded from their intend- II a o a log to make an attempt upon the lower fide of the bridge. But it foon appeared, that their only view way to fecond the operations of the belieged, and To complete that runt which they expected the expiolion of the fire-thips would certainly produce.

ILT5-

THEAR vellels were four down the river, with a favourable wind and ride, on the 4th of April. The Spaniards who had got fome imperfect intelligence of their nature, were filled with the most auxious expectations. They knew them to be fire-thips from their unufurl appearance, and were variously affected, according to the various conjectures which they formed of the effects that were about to be produced. But they were all alike prompted by curiofity, to witness a spectacle which had never been exhibited in any fiege hefore. And the banks of the river, the forts and redoubts, and even the bridge itself were crowded with spectators,

Os feveral vellels which Giambelli had prepared, only two were conflructed in the manner above mentioned, the one of which contained in its mine fix thousand pounds of gun-powder, and the other, feven thousand five hundred pounds. One of them ran athore before it reached the bridge. But the other being more fortunate in its direction, was driven towards that part of the bridge, where the flucado on the Flanders fide was united to the ships. A number of the Spanith officers and foldiers had the courage to jump on board, in order to extinguish the train, which Giambelli had contrived in fuch a manner, as to require an hour before it could reach the mine, The prince of Parma had advanced a little way on the flocado, to wait for the event; but was revailed upon by his officers to retire. He had fearcely. Beox xix. 1585, foarcely entered the neighbouring fort, when the explosion happened, with a noise more dreadful than the loudest thunder. A sudden darkness overspread the region round. The ground shook as in an earthquake. The river, disturbed in its course, was thrown over its dikes, and poured into the fort of Caloo with inconceivable vio-Not only fuch of the Spaniards perished as had ventured to go on board the fire-ships. but all those too who were upon the bridge, and many of those who stood upon the banks of the river. No language can describe the horror of the scene which presented itself after the smoke was dispelled. The bridge, and both the surface and the banks of the river, were covered with the dead and wounded; whose bodies were disfigured in a thousand hideous ways by the smoke and flames, and the various instruments of destruction with which the ship was stored. Eight hundred men were killed, and a great number maimed and dangerously wounded. Among the killed were many officers of distinction; but no person perished so deeply lamented by the prince of Parma, as the marquis de Roubais, the general of the horse; a nobleman distinguished by many shining accomplishments; brave, active, and expert both in the arts of peace and war, once an enemy of Spain; but who, prompted by jealousy of the prince of Orange, had abandoned the cause of liberty, and shewn for some years past no less zeal in reducing his countryman under the Spanish yoke, than he had discovered formerly in afferting their independence. It was not only losses of this kind which the prince of Parma fulfained on this occasion. The bridge likewise suffered considerable damage. Six of the ships which composed the middle part of it, were burnt; some were forced from their stations, and others turned with their keels uppermost, and dashed to pieces.

1585.

Is the confederates had improved the opportunity which this havock afforded them, the whole work might have been demolished; and in that case, a prediction of the prince of Orange would have been fulfilled, that if Farnese with so small an army should undertake the siege of Antwerp, it would prove his ruin. But, as was observed by the old experienced Mondragone, it appeared from many circumstances in the conduct of the confederates in this siege, that the prince of Orange was dead.

By some strange fatality, or some unaccountable inadvertence, or, as one historian infinuates, by a miliunderstanding between the magistrates of Antwerp and the admiral of the Antwerp fleet, those fireships which had cost so great an expence of money, ingenuity, time, and pains, were fent down the Scheld before any concert had been formed with the confederates at Lillo, who were therefore unprepared to second that mighty effort which had been made for opening the navigation of the river.—Giambelli, though extremely folicitous to know the success of his invention, remained entirely ignorant of it for two days. A large reward was offered to those who should venture to go down the river forintelligence. But none had courage to advance far enough to make any certain discovery, nor did the citizens know any thing of what had happened till the third night after, when they received information of it by a melsenger from count Hohenloe.

THE prince of Parma was in the mean time employed in repairing the bridge, and he exerted himfelf with so much activity and vigour, that it was made as strong as ever before the besieged were acquainted with the damage which it had fustained. His late experience suggested to him an alteration in the work, which was found afterwards of great importance: this was to remove the flotas, and to form that part of the bridge which was composed of the ships, in such a manner that, in case the Book XIX. enemy should repeat their experiment, it might be opened at different places to let the fire-ships 1585. pass through and continue their course down the river.

of Google

Other attempts of

THE spirits of the besieged were still supported the belieged, by the fanguine hopes which they had conceived from that enormous vessel, which they called the end of the war. This huge machine was entirely the work of the citizens, and was not approved of either by Giambelli or St. Aldegonde. It was found, on trial, too unwieldy to answer the purpose for which it was intended. After planting the lower part of it with cannon, and filling the higher part with musketteers, they made an attack upon one of the Spanish redoubts; but they failed in their attempt, and the machine itself was so much shattered, as to be rendered almost unfit for future use.

> AT Giambelli's desire, the senate of Antwerp had again recourse to their first expedient of fireships; but the enemy having learnt the nature of these machines, employed different means to render them ineffectual. They laid hold of them as foon as they appeared, and fometimes extinguished the trains, and fometimes dragged the veffels to the banks of the river, or through the openings in the bridge.

> GIAMBELLI then bethought himself of another device, from which he believed that some more certain effect might be expected. Having bound together in one compacted body fifteen ships armed with pointed beams, and with scythes or falchions, for cutting the chains and cordage of the bridge, he fent them accompanied with fireships down the river when the wind and tide were combined and favourable. The shock which this contrivance produced was very great, but through the wife precaution which Farnese had taken, by making making the openings just now mentioned, together with the unexampled boldness of his soldiers. in laying hold of the fire-ships, the bridge received no greater damage than could be quickly repaired. Some other expedients were proposed by Giambelli, but the senate was deterred from adopting them, partly by the expence and time requifite to prepare his machines, and partly by the difficulty of mariners and foldiers willing to expose themselves to the danger with which the putting his inventions in practice would have been. attended.

> > Digitized by GOOGLE

Book XIX. 1585.

THERE remained now for the besieged only The counone resource, to which, if they had given proper terdyke of attention in the beginning, all the anxiety, expence and labour, which they bestowed in attempting to demolish the bridge, might have been faved. In order to form a clear conception of what will be faid on this interesting part of the present subject, it is necessary to remember that the ground on the north fide of the Scheld, between Antwerp and Lillo, is much lower than the rest of the country, and were it not for the dyke of the river would every tide be overflowed. This ground is generally covered with water in many places, but in other parts it furnishes pasture for a great number of cattle with which the Antwerp market is supplied. Through the middle of this plain there runs from the village of Couvestein, where the country begins to rife, to the great dyke of the Scheld, a smaller dyke, called the Counterdike of Couvestein, which had been formed to serve for a road or causeway. The confederates at Lillo could, by opening the dyke of the Scheld, lay all the ground under water between Lillo and the counterdyke, while the besieged could, with the same facility, introduce the river into that part of the plain which lies between the counterdyke and Antwerp; and thus, by breaking down the counterdyke, the innundations on Book each fide of it could be united, and a free navigation opened between Antwerp and Lillo.

1585.

THE reader will easily perceive, that while the bridge stood, the fate of Antwerp depended entirely on the counterdyke; and that, in case the confederates could make themselves masters of it. they might bid defiance to the prince of Parma, and without anxiety suffer him to retain possession of the bridge. If, in the beginning, they had believed it practicable for him to execute his design of blocking up the river, they could have fortified themselves on the counterdyke in such a manner. that with the assistance of the inundation, they would have baffled his most vigorous efforts to expel them. But they were deceived by the contempt which they entertained of his intended enterprise. and did not perceive their error in neglecting to occupy this important station till it was too late. The prince of Parma had already seized upon it. and taken every necessary precaution against the attempts which he doubted not they would fooner or later make to wrest it from him. He committed the charge of defending it to two of his most vigilant officers, Mondragone and Mansveldt. He ordered it to be made broader and higher than it was before. He strengthened it with piles of wood driven into it transversely, and he erected feveral forts upon it, besides planting redoubts on the dyke of the Scheld, with which he intended to take the enemy in flank, in case they should venture to approach.

THE confederates, however, despairing of being able to demolish the bridge, resolved, if posfible, to dislodge him from the counterdyke. And their first attempt, after laying the ground on each side of it under water, was made in the beginning of May by count Hohenloe. That general had formed the plan of this attack in concert with St. Aldegonde, who was to have cooperated with him, and had agreed to fet fail with the Antwerp fleet immediately after lighting up, Book on a tower in the city, three fires, as a fignal of, his departure. By a mistake of the person to whom the charge of this fignal was committed, it was exhibited before the time, and through this untoward accident count Hohenloe was left alone in the execution of his enterprize. He conducted it however with vigour, and laid one of the forts and a part of the counterdyke in ruins; after which he thought it prudent to retire, and to referve his forces unimpaired till the belieged should be ready to fecond his operations. This unfortunate attempt served only to rouse the prince of Parma to greater vigilance and exertion. Agreeably to his conjectures, he saw that the principal efforts of the enemy would henceforth be directed against the counterdyke: and, therefore, he not only applied himself with diligence to repair the damage which it had fultained in the late attack, but vifited every day all the redoubts and forts, and reinforced the garrisons with chosen troops taken from the several nations of which his army was composed.

Digitized by Google. the 1585.

THE confederates at Lillo, and the people of Antwerp, were in the mean time indefatigable in making preparations for another attack. St. Aldogonde flood almost single in his opinion on this occasion, and endeavoured to convince his countrymen, that it would be easier for them to destroy the bridge itself, than to make themselves masters of the counterdyke, in opposition to an enemy so much upon their guard, and so strongly fortified. But having, fince their disappointment with the regard to the effect of the fire-ships, been accustomed to considered the bridge as impregnable, they were deaf to whatever he could advance upon the subject, and he was obliged to concur (which he did with all his wonted activity) in the execution of that design of which the majority approved,

TOWARDS

192

Воок

Towards the end of May every thing was prepared both at Antwerp and Lillo that was thought necessary to secure success; and, on the Battle of the 26th of that month, count Hohenloe, according counterdyke to concert with St. Aldegonde, sailed from Lillo early in the morning, with a squadron of more than a hundred ships, having on board a numerous body of troops, under the command of the most experienced officers n the United Provinces 4. He resolved to make his attack at the broadest part of the counterdyke, between the two middle forts. called the fort of the Palisades and fort St. George, where there was room to intrench his troops. In order to facilitate his landing, he fent before him four veffels resembling fire-ships, with some trains of gunpowder, to which the foldiers, who were concealed within, let fire. This device produced the designed effect. The Spaniards taking the smoke and flame for the forerunners of an explofion, retired hastily from that part of the dyke to which they faw the veffels approaching. The confederates in the mean time advanced, and landed between seven and eight hundred men. The Spaniards foon discovered the artifice by which they had been deceived, and immediately returned to the station which they had left. An obstinate and bloody action enfued, while the contending parties were supported on the one side by the cannon of the fleet, and on the other by those of the forts on the counterdyke.

> In the midst of this contest St. Aldegonde arrived with the fleet from Antwerp, which was nearly as numerous as that from Lillo. The confederates being thus powerfully reinforced, kept possession of the ground which they had gained. and while fome of them fought, others were employed in cutting the counterdyke, and in raifing ing temporary defences of piles of wood, and Book facks of earth and wool, against the fire of the enemy. The combatants being cooped up in a 1585. narrow space, every stroke and shot did execution. But they received continual supplies of fresh men from the ships and forts, and their courage was fuperior to every danger. Both St. Aldegonde and Hohenloe mingled with the combatants, and by their example and exhortations nourished the desperate and intrepid ardour of the foldiers. "This is the last difficulty, cried St. Aldegonde. which remains to be furmounted. Perfift as you have begun, and Antwerp, that bulwark of our confederacy, will foon be delivered. Your liberty, your future safety, and every thing dear and sacred. depend on the fuccess of your present enterprise. We have now no choice left but victory or death."

⁴ Justin de Nassau, Iselstein, Fremin, Morgan, and Balsour.

THE Spanish generals were at no less pains to animate ibeir troops. Both Mondragone and Mansveldt, though worn out with age and the fatigues of a long continued warfare, displayed on this occasion the utmost intrepidity. Notwithstanding their most vigorous exertions, the confederates still maintained their ground. They twice repulsed the Italians and Spaniards. Of the materials which they had brought along with them, they raised a considerable bulwark against the enemy's artillery. They made feveral openings in the counterdyke, and were so confident of victory, that St. Aldegonde and count Hohenloe, after assigning to the several officers their respective stations, set sail for Antwerp in a ship which had passed through one of these openings, and entered the city in triumph. Their design, it is faid, was to confult with the magistrates concerning some future measures which they thought necessary Vol. II.

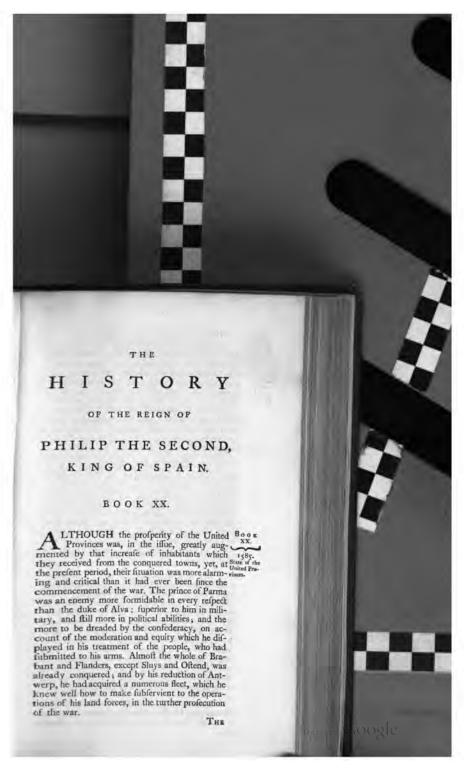

PHILIP II. KING OF SPAIN.

201

the burden of the war; and in a few years afterwards they found themselves in a capacity, not only to defend their infant state, but to attack their powerful adversary, with splendor and success, in the most distant regions of the globe.

THE

States had fent to him on this occasion, the most Book gracious reception; affured them of his gratitude for the trust and confidence which the States were . 1585. pleased to repose in him; and bad him rely upon him for every mark of friendship in his power to But as their propolal was of too much importance to be haftily embraced, he defired they would deliver it in writing, that it might be fubmitted to the revital of his counfellors.

HENRY would not have thus delayed giving State of them a decifive answer, if he had been at liberty, France. either to purfue his own inclinations, or to confult the interest of France. Peace indeed had been established between the inveterate factions, into which his kingdom was divided; and the catholic league was apparently extinct. But the causes to which that pernicious confederacy owed its birth, still sublisted; and it required a much more dexterous and fleady hand than that of Henry; to guide the reins of government in fuch a manner as to prevent the passions of the parties from breaking out again with as much violence as be-Henry duke of Guise, son of the celebrated Francis, was superior to his father in exterior accomplishments, and not inferior to him either in military or political abilities. Like his father too. he was actuated with the most inordinate ambition: and could not endure that infigrificance, to which the king's aversion to his bold aspiring character had reduced him. Enraged at being excluded from the government of the state, while all the power which he and his adherents had formerly enjoyed was engrossed by the minions of the king, he resolved either to compel Henry to redress his grievances, or to deprive him of his With the most indefatigable industry he applied himself to the prosecution to his design. His emissaries were spread every where; the kingdom swarmed with anonymous letters; and the pulpit resounded with the imminent danger to which the church was exposed. "For the king, it was said, notwithstanding his pretensions to fanctity, had neither no religion at all, or was secretly attached to that of the Hugonots; for whom he had in his late treaty with them, discovered the most unjustifiable partiality. This alone was sufficient to rouse the indignation of every faithful son of the church; but there was ground for the most alarming apprehensions, when it was considered, that the duke of Anjou being now dead, and the king without any hopes of issue, the crown must (if the people did not exert themselves with vigour to prevent it) be inherited by the king of Navarre, a relapsed heretic, and a determined enemy of their holy faith "."

Digitizwhichoogle

206

The catholic league.

By these means the duke of Guise united more than one half of the kingdom in a fanatical, but firm confederacy, with which he hoped to controul, and in time to annihilate the authority of the king. In order to gain greater respect to this confederacy, he placed at the head of it Charles, cardinal b of Bourbon, a zealous catholic, far advanced intyears, and noted for the weakness of his understanding. Guise intended this prelate for Henry's successor, in the event of the death or deposition of that prince; and he expected under him to engross the whole administration, and to pave the way for his own accession to the throne.

The king of Spain was not an unconcerned spectator of these transactions, in a kingdom, to the affairs of which he had, for several years, given the most particular attention. For, besides the deep concern, which, agreeably to his general system of politics, he had ever taken in all the contests between the catholics and protestants in almost every European state, he was greatly interested ^{*} Memoires de la ligue, tom. iii.

b Uncle to the king of Navarra.

terested to prevent the king of Navarre (whose Book dominions he held unjustly) from ascending the throne of France; and there was no other means, he knew, by which he could deter the French monarch from lending assistance to the United Provinces, but to furnish him with employment at home.

Moved by this last consideration, he had given His views. assistance to the league, when it was first formed by the same factious leaders some years before. He was now more determined than ever to support it; prompted partly by the motives that have been mentioned, and partly by this consideration, that by somenting the disturbances in France, he would exhaust the strength of that mighty monarchy, and thereby either acquire possession of it himself, or be at least delivered from all dread of that power, which he believed to be the only one in Europe able to counteract his designs.

HAVING some time before the present period His treaty revived his negociations with the duke of Guise, with the and the other heads of the league, he gave orders to his commissioners, Morreo, and Baptista Tassi, to form an alliance with them, without delay. And it was accordingly concluded between the Spanish envoys on the hand, and the dukes of Guise and Mayenne, and the sieur de Menneville, agent for the cardinal of Bourbon, on the other, at Joinville, on the 2d of February, one thousand five hundred and eighty-five, upon the following conditions:

"THAT in case the present king of France should die without male-issue, the cardinal of Bourbon should, as first prince of the blood, be declared king; and all those persons excluded from the succession, who were either heretics themselves or favourers of heretics.

"Тнат

Book of That the cardinal of Bourbon should, in the event of his succeeding to the crown, ratify the peace of Chateau-Cambress, between the courts of France and Spain.

- 's Than he should prohibit the exercise of every religion but the catholic, within his dominions.
- THAT he should restore to Philip all the places which had been taken from him by the Hugonots, and assist him in subduing his rebellious subjects in the Netherlands.
- THAT, on the other hand, Philip should contribute fifty thousand crowns a month, for the support of the confederacy, besides assisting it with a sufficient number of troops, till herefy should be utterly extripated. That he should take the cardinal of Bourbon, the lords of the house of Guise, and all others who should accede to the league, under his protection; and that neither of the contracting parties should enter into any treaty with the king of France, without mutual consent."
- BESIDES these conditions, which were committed to writing, and subscribed, Philip engaged to pay annually the sum of two hundred thousand crowns to the duke of Guise, to be disposed of by him as he should judge most conducive for the interest of the league. And it was agreed, that this whole transaction should be concealed, till a more convenient season for divulging it.

Henry, however, received intelligence of the congress; and from former experience it was easy for him to conjecture the purpose for which it had been held. Soon after this, the embassy from the States of Holland arrived, and was received in the manner above mentioned. Mendoza, the Spanish resident, could not be ignorant of what had passed at Joinville; yet he complained to Henry of his kind reception of the Dutch ambassadors, as being 1585.

being inconsistent with the friendship which he Book owed to the catholic king. Henry replied to this. complaint, with a degree of firmness and dignity, which it had been happy for himself, and for his subjects, if he could have maintained uniformly in his conduct. "I do not, faid he, consider the people of the Netherlands as rebels, but as men whose patience has been worn by oppression. Humanity and justice incline me to take an interest in the diffress of a neighbouring nation, once subject to the crown of France. I have not however as yet resolved to concern myself in their affiairs. am unwilling to violate that peace which subsists between your mafter and me; although I know, that, on his part, it has been violated. My resolution will appear, when I shall think fit to disclose it. In the mean time I defire it may be remembered, that I shall not be intimidated by the threats of the king of Spain; and that I am master of my conduct, and at liberty, without being answerable to any other prince, to make either peace or war. as I incline."

Among Henry's counsellors there, were some Henry heliwho exhorted him to embrace so tempting an op-tate as to accepting the portunity as the present, of advancing the glory proffered so-The perplexed situation of his af-vereignty. of his crown. fairs, they faid, ought rather to determine him to enter into foreign war, than to deter him from engaging in it. It would prove the most effectual remedy for those noxious humours with which his kingdom was distempered, by giving a new direction to that restless spirit with which his subjects had long been actuated; and it would be found the furest method of disappointing the deligns of the duke of Guise, by depriving him of the assistance of the catholic king, to whom it would furnish sufficient employment in defence of his own dominions.

Vol. II.

p

Such

210

Book XX. .1584.

Such was the reasoning of those who advised Henry to accept of the fovereignty of the United Provinces. It was plausible, but not substantial "For where," faid others of his counor folid. fellors, seconded by the queen-mother, "can troops he found in France sufficient to carry on a war against an enemy so powerful as the king of Spain? Upon such of the catholics as are in league with that monarch, the king can have no reliance. the contrary, they would unite with Philip against their native fovereign. To compole an army of fuch catholics as retain their fidelity, and to fend that army to the Netherlands, would be to abandon the kingdom naked and defenceless to the duke of Guile. And were the king to apply to the protestants for assistance, what purpose would that measure serve, but to excite an universal alarm, and to determine all the catholics in the kingdom to accede to the league?"

He declines .

HENRY could not relift the force of these arguaccepting it. ments. Finding himself therefore thus fettered by his factious subjects, he resolved, though with much reluctance, to decline the tempting offer which the States had made to him; and having called their ambassadors, he informed them that the unhappy fituation of his domestic affairs rendered it impossible for him at present to accept of their offer, or to undertake their protection; but that he would not fail to recommend their cause to the queen of England in the warmest manner .

Anxiety of England.

ELIZABETH had formerly approved of their the queen of election of the duke of Anjou, and had even contributed her endeavours to promote it. But she dreaded the union of the provinces with France, as an event which would have raised the maritime power of that kingdom to a superiority above her own, and therefore she had regarded, with a jealous eye, their making a tender to Henry of their fovereignty. No fooner was the informed of his resolution to decline accepting it, than her anxiety taking another direction, she dreaded that their despair would induce them to throw themselves on the mercy of their former fovereign, whose severest vengeance, she could not doubt, would be poured out upon her, as foon as his affairs in the Netherlands were composed.

c Reidan. lib. iv. D'Avila, Mb. vii. Van Meteren, lib. xii. p. 376.

Book XX. 1585.

In order to prevent this effect of Henry's refu- The States fal, which was a more immediate object of her offer of the dread, than any consequence that could have ari- sovereignly. fen from his acceptance, she sent an ambassador to rouse their drooping spirits, and to give them hopes of her protection. The States were encouraged, by this mark of her attention, to form the resolution of making the same offer of their sovereignty to her, which they had made to the king of France: and ambaffadors were accordingly appointed, and fent over to England in the month of July 1585.

THESE ambassadors employed every argument which they could devise, to prevail upon Elizabeth to yield to their defire. After testifying in the ftrongest terms that gratitude with which the States were penetrated, on account of the favour which she had already afforded them; they represented, "That they had now more occasion than ever for her friendship, and must fink under the power of Philip, who possessed such inexhaustible resources, if the did not speedily interpose in their behalf. But although the power of the confederacy was small, when compared with those mighty efforts which which were made by the king of Spain to enflave it. it was not unworthy of the queen's attention and regard. Besides possessing some important towns in Brabant, Flanders, and Guelderland, P 2

Book XX. 1585. they were still in possession of Holland, Zealand, Utrecht, and Friesland, in which there were many flourishing and well fortified cities, capacious harbours, and navigable rivers, from which the queen's subjects would derive infinite advantage in the way of commerce; not to mention that, by the accesfion of so numerous a fleet as that of the United Provinces, her navy would be able to give law to all the maritime powers in Europe. far from supposing that interest alone would determine the queen to regard their present application; they had already experienced her generofity. and they now adressed her as the sovereign of a powerful kingdom, who had shewn that she was touched with their calamities. It was their earnest defire at this time, that she would accept of the fovereignty of the provinces, upon the fame conditions on which their native princes had enjoyed it, and that she would henceforth consider the people of the Netherlands as her faithful subjects. who would vie with those of her native kingdom in demonstrating their attachment to her person, and in advancing the glory of her reign."

ELIZABETH received this proposal with much complacency, and assured the ambassadors, that they should not return without carrying such an answer along with them as would entirely satisfy the States; but before she could be more particular in her reply, she must consider the assair with that attention which it deserved, and hear the opinions of her counsellors.

She deliberates on the subject.

THE same thing happened on this occasion in the court of England, as in that of France some months before. Elizabeth's ministers were no less divided in their sentiments than those of Henry, and formed their judgments as courtiers are wont to do in matters of doubtful issue, conformably either to the natural temper of their mind, or to the inclination of the prince.

THERE

1585.

THERE were fome among them who thought, Book that both justice and prudence required that Elizabeth should reject the offer that had been made to her; "for it was the common interest of princes, they faid, that subjects should be retained in their allegiance; and to encourage them in the violation of it, was in reality to undermine the foundations of their own authority. The queen had hitherto favoured the inhabitants of the Low Countries, not as a free and independent nation, but as a people who were cruelly oppressed; and her intention had not been to enable them to renounce their allegiance, but to induce their king to treat them with greater equity and moderation. In this purpose they thought she might still persist. But to acknowledge the States for fovereigns, and to accept from their hands that fovereignty which belonged to another, would not only be a violation of that justice which princes owe to one another, but might be attended with the most dangerous consequences to her own repose. The king of Spain would not rest satisfied till he had retaliated so great an injury. The state of Ireland, and even that of England, where there was so great a number of catholics devoted to his service, would furnish him with means of executing his design. And from fomenting a spirit of division among her subjects, he would soon pass to an open invafion of her kingdom. With bis arms the spiritual thunder of the Roman pontiff would co-operate. and in that case such a number of enemies might be excited against her, as would endanger the stability of her throne."

But others of Elizabeth's counsellors were of opinion, that fo inviting an opportunity as the present ought not to be neglected, and that the queen could not, with reason, be accused of injustice for embracing it. The States, compelled by necessity, had, several years before the present period, assumed the soveleignty into their own hands.

Digitized by Google

Boos hands, and fince that time they had conferred it upon the duke of Anjou, whom the queen had 1585. virtually recognized for their lawful sovereign. The king of Spain had clearly forfeited his right to their obedience, by his violation of all the conditions on which that right was founded. withstanding this, he will no doubt be highly offended," continued they, "if the queen shall think fit to listen to the present application. can he be more an enemy to the queen, than he has already shewn himself? Has he not long endeavoured to stir up her disaffected subjects in Ire-And in England, does he not purfue the fame hostile and insidious designs? Has he not warmly espoused the cause of the queen of Scots? Does he not on every occasion shew himself an implacable enemy to the English name? what is it that has so long prevented him from declaring open war, but that his revolted subjects in the Netherlands have hitherto afforded full employment to all the forces which he could spare from his ambitious enterprises? When he shall have disengaged himself from his embarrassments in the Low Countries, can we doubt that he will turn his arms against the queen? It is the part of prudence to provide against a distant as well as against an immediate danger; and prudence and a regard to felf-preservation require that the queen should to the utmost of her power support the people of the United Provinces, because in their preservation the peace and security of her own dominions are involved. If the reject the application of the States, and either give them no affistance, or fuch only as has hitherto been granted, they will foon be overpowered, and Philip will then be not only at greater leifure, but much more able than at present to execute his designs. But if the queen accept of the advantageous offer that is made to her, and exert herfelf with vigour in defence of this people, who defire to become her subjects.

Subjects she will encounter her enemy at a distance Boor from home, she will be powerfully affisted by a brave and determined ally, and with her fleet acting in concert with that of the States, the will be able to maintain the tranquillity of her kingdom."

XX. 1585.

ELIZABETH readily perceived the force of this Elizabeth reasoning: she believed that an open breach with undertakes Philip was unavoidable, and she thought it more tion of the eligible to begin hoshilities herself now, than to wait till her adversary should be in a condition to execute his deligns against her. She resolved however to decline accepting the fovereignty which the States had offered her, either because she apprehended that it would prove a greater burden than she was able to support, or because she was afraid of exciting the jealousy of the neighbouring powers. But while for these reasons she desired that the supreme authority might still remain in the hands of the States, the resolved to afford them her protection; and with this view, after having received particular information concerning their strength, and the number of troops necesfary for carrying on the war, she concluded a treaty with them, of which the principal articles were those which follow: "That the queen should furnish the States with five thousand foot and one thousand horse, to be commanded by a protestant general of her appointment, and to be paid by her during the continuance of the war. That after the conclusion of the war the States should repay her expences, and that the towns of Brille and Flushing, and the fort of Rammekins, should be immediately delivered to her, and should remain in her possession till she were fully reimbursed. That the commander of the forces, the governors of provinces and towns, and all the officers and foldiers, should take an oath of fidelity to the queen and the States. That in case it should be found 1585.

Book found expedient to employ a fleet in the common cause, the States should furnish the same number of ships as the queen, to be commanded by an English admiral. That the commander in chief. and two English ministers residing in the Netherlands, should be admitted into the assembly of the States. That none of the rights or privileges of the confederated provinces should be violated, and no change introduced in the established religion or government. And lastly, That neither of the two contracting parties should, without mutual consent, make peace, or enter into alliance with the king of Spain 4.

Leicester appointed commanderin chicf.

This treaty was no fooner ratified, than Elizabeth issued orders for carrying it into execution. The earl of Leicester (to whom this wise princess had been long attached in a degree which far exceeded his merit and fervices) was appointed general of the forces, and went over with them to Holland in the beginning of the year 1586, accompanied by more than five hundred gentlemen. who intended to serve under him as volunteers. Leicester had neither courage, capacity, moderation, nor integrity, to qualify him for the arduous task that was assigned to him, but his defects were concealed under the glare of superficial accomplishments; with which, as he had long deceived the penetration of Elizabeth, he now imposed upon the people of the Netherlands, and excited in them the most flattering and delusive hopes. From his first arrival they regarded him as the restorer of their fallen state, and profusely heaped upon him every mark of honour which their immoderate fondness could devise. Not satisfied with receiving him rather as a prince and a conqueror, who had already wrought their deliverance, than as the subject of an ally by whom he had been sent to their affistance, they conferred upon him the offices d Bentivoglio, part ii. lib. v. Camden, ann. 1585.

PHILIP II. KING OF SPAIN.

1 586.

217

fices of governor general of the confederacy, and Book commander in chief of all their forces by sea and. land.

By this precipitate measure, of which they had afterwards the greatest reason to repent, they intended to gratify the queen, and if possible to induce her to take a deeper interest in their affairs. But they were exceedingly disappointed in their expectations; she was offended at their artifice, and immediately dispatched her vice-chancellor to complain of their conduct, as being calculated to make the world believe her infincere in the declaration which she had published, of intending only to affift the provinces, and not to undertake the absolute charge of their protection. She defired that the States would recall that authority which they had conferred on Leicester, and commanded him to rest contented with the portion of power which she had given him. But it is extremely doubtful whether Elizabeth was in reality as much incenfed on this occasion as she appeared to be. She foon discovered an unwillingues to mortify her favourite's vanity and ambition; lent a favourable ear to the apology that was made to her by the States, and did not infift on a compliance with her request. Whatever was her motive for this conduct, Leicester was installed in the government, and invested with the most ample powers; after which he proceeded to make preparations for putting a stop to the progress of the Spanish arms.

THE prince of Parma, on the other hand, was Operations no less active in preparing for the further prose-of the prince cution of the war. After the acquisition of so many important towns, he had conceived the most sanguine expectations of being able soon to complete

Sir Thomas Heneage.

Book complete the reduction of the revolted provinces. But by the interpolition of Elizabeth he perceived his victory fnatched from him, when he thought himself upon the point of reaping it, and was exceedingly disappointed and chagrined. Finding himself however still superior to his enemy in the field, he resolved to improve this advantage, and as foon as the feafon would permit, to proceed with his wonted vigour.

The fiege of Grave.

THE confederates had, notwithstanding their loss of Maestricht above related, been able to keep possession of two considerable towns on the Maeie. Grave in Brabant, and Venlo in Guelderland. Farnele was delirous to make himself master of these two places before he should turn his arms against the northern provinces; and early in the fpring he fent count Charles of Mansveldt to form the blockade of Grave. Mansveldt executed his commission with little opposition, by casting a bridge over the Maese, and by building forts and redoubts not only on the dykes of the river, but on the land side of the town, where he pitched his camp, and cut off all communication between the besieged and the country behind them. The town was defended by an English garrison, under the command of a young nobleman, baron de Hemeret, a native of Guelderland. Leicester fensible that the place was of the greatest importance for preventing the enemy from advancing into the provinces of Guelderland and Utrecht. went himself as far as the city of Utrecht, and from thence fent count Hohenloe and colonel Norris with two thousand five hundred foot, partly natives and partly English, to the relief of the befleged. The natives arrived first, and having taken one of the Spanish forts on the banks of the Maese, opposite to Grave, they had begun to fortify themselves upon the dyke, when Mans-veldt having received intelligence of their arrival, fent fent three thousand Spaniards over the bridge Book already mentioned. By these troops the confederates were compelled to abandon their fortifications, and to retire along the dyke; but Norris and the English forces coming up to their assistance, a bloody battle enfued. The English, though long inured to peace, gave proof on this occasion of that strong military genius by which they have so often distinguished themselves in their wars upon the continent. They drove the veteran Spaniards before them with irreliftible impetuolity, killed several hundreds of them, befides seven captains, and a great number of inferior officers, and compelled them to continue their retreat till they reached their fortifications on the bridge. There they were supported by fresh troops fent by Mansveldt from the camp. battle was renewed, and both parties fought for some time with the same fury as before, till they were separated by a violent storm of wind and rain, which rendered all their efforts ineffectual. Through this accident the Spaniards still retained possession of the bridge, but the rain which fell, furnished count Hohenloe with the means of relieving the besieged. The river being swelled to an uncommon height, he broke down the dyke near Ravestein, which stands on the same side with Grave, and having laid all the country between Ravestein and Grave under water, he conveyed to the belieged, ammunition, provisions, and a supply of troops, across the inundation.

XX. ı 586.

THE prince of Parma, alarmed with this success of the confederates, let out for Grave with his main army; and in a few days after his arrival before the place two batteries were planted, and a part of the wall was demolished. It might still however have been defended for a confiderable time; and De Hemeret, the governor, gave the earl of Leicester the strongest assurances that he would B o o E XX. 1586.

would hold out to the last. But his courage failing, he began to talk of the necessity of surrendering; and, although only two or three of his officers approved of his design, while all the rest remonstrated against it as cowardly and dishonourable, he refolved to put it in execution; and upon the 7th of June, before the breach was practicable, or the enemy had taken any measures for an assault, he sent to the prince of Parma a propofal to capitulate. The prince readily granted him the most favourable conditions, and suffered him and the garrison to march out with their arms and baggage. But as De Hemeret was undeserving of this honour, he foon had reason to repent of the infamous part into which his cowardice had betrayed him. Both he and the officers who had concurred with him, were condemned by a court martial to be beheaded. The fentence was acknowledged to be just, yet De Hemeret's fate excited great commiseration in his countrymen. He was too young for the important trust which had been committed to him; there was no reason to suspect him of treachery or corruption, and he folicited in the most earnest manner to have his life spared, and to be permitted to engage in some perilous enterprize in which he might retrieve his honour. But Leicester thinking it necessary at this time, for the establishment of military discipline, which had been greatly relaxed, to give an example of severity, rejected all the applications which were made in his behalf.

Siege of Venlo. IMMEDIATELY after the furrender of Grave, Farnese led his army, amounting to twenty thousand foot and three thousand horse, to besiege Venlo; and he made the greater haste in his expedition against that place, the only one on the left side of the Maese which remained in the hands of the consederates, as he understood that the garrison Meteren, p. 403. Bentivoglio, p. ii. lib. ii. and Strada.

B o o k xx.

garrison was weak, and that the celebrated Martin Schench, who commonly resided in it, had, by Leicester's orders, marched with the greatest part of his troops to secure the town of Gueldres. This man, a native of Guelderland, and a foldier of fortune, is celebrated by all the cotemporary historians, on account of his extraordinary valour. activity, and enterprize. Having first attached himself to the Spanish party in the Netherlands, he performed for that party several important services, but thinking himself dishonoured by a preference which the general bestowed on a Spanish officer, he had deferted to the States. Schench no fooner heard that the Spanish army had begun the fiege of Venlo, than he fet out with a body of horse in order to throw himself into the place. Finding it completely invested on every side, he attacked the beliegers in the middle of the night, and having penetrated beyond the general's tent, he continued to advance till he had almost reached one of the gates of the town; but he could not enter, by reason of certain barricades which Farnese had raised to prevent the sallies of the garrison. Before he had time to demolish these, the whole camp was up in arms, and obliged him to abandon his attempt. He fought his way back through the thickest of the enemy, and escaped with the loss of between forty and fifty men. He made several other vigorous efforts for the relief of the besieged, but they were all rendered abortive by the forefight and vigilance of the prince of Parma, who repelled his attacks; and, in spite of the annoyance which he gave him from without, kept up an incessant fire upon the town till a great part of the wall was demolished. The different nations of which the army confifted, were disputing with each other for the honour of beginning the affault, when the belieged, dreading the fatal consequences that might follow, furrendered with those which had been granted to the citizens of Grave. The prince of Parma found it necessary to employ all his authority to prevent the foldiers, whom the capitulation disappointed of their prey, from offering violence to the inhabitants; and he gave a proof of his respect for Schench, by treating his wife and sister in the most honourable manner, and furnishing them with his own coach to carry them to whatever place they should incline s.

The fiege FROM Venlo, Farnese went without delay and and defiruc-invested Nuys, which belongs to the bishopric of Cologn, but was at that time in the possession of the States.

GEBHERT de Trusches, the archbishop and elector of Cologn, having, about three years before the present period, abjured the catholic religion, and married, attempted still to retain his bishopric and electorate; but his canons, supported by the pope and emperor, excommunicated him; and having made war against him, in which they were affifted by the prince of Parma, they obliged him to take refuge in Holland, and elected in his room Ernest, son of the duke of Bavaria. count de Meurs, one of his partizans, soon after recovered for him, by furprize, the town of Nuys, and obtained from the States a garrison, with which he had been able not only to defend that town against the force of Ernest, but to over-run the country, and do infinite mischief to the catholic inhabitants. Ernest, unable to repress their eruptions, had gone himself in disguise to the prince of Parma to solicit his assistance, and it was in compliance with his request, that Farnese, postponing the profecution of his defigns against the northern provinces, engaged in his present enterprize.

8 Meteren. Strada.

1586.

He knew that Philip regarded no under- Book taking as foreign to his interest, in which the security of the catholic religion was concerned; and he dreaded that if the garrison of Nuys was not checked in time, they might gather strength, and perfuade some of the neighbouring protestant princes to espouse their cause. Some historians affirm, that he was likewife prompted by the prospect of that glory which he would acquire, thould he conquer in a few weeks, as he expected, a town which Charles the Bold duke of Burgundy had in vain attempted to reduce with an army of fixty thousand men in the space of a year.

In this expectation he was not disappointed. Through a misfortune which befell the garrison in the perion of Cloet the governor, who, being dangeroufly wounded, was disabled from attending to the operations of the defence, their resolution failed; and in less than three weeks after the prince's arrival before the town, they began to treat of a surrender. That he might save time. and deliver the town as entire as possible to the elector, Farnese agreed without any difficulty to an armistice; and he had begun to treat with the deputies of the besieged, concerning the terms of capitulation, when the Italian and Spanish troops, (who had been highly incenfed on account of his having prevented them from plundering the inhabitants of Venlo) being transported with a sudden rage, ran forward in contempt of his authority, and assaulted the town on different sides, while the garrison, who trusted to the armistice, were off their guard. Meeting with little refusance, they quickly scaled the walls, spread themselves over the town, and butchered all who fell in their way, without distinction of age, sex, or condition. Nor was their barbarous cruelty fatiated with the horrid carnage which they committed. Their fury being turned into madness, they spurned the thoughts

HISTORY OF THE REIGN OF

224

Book thoughts of plunder, and fet fire to the town; and as the wind was high, and most of the houses were built of wood, it was in a few hours confumed to Two churches only escaped, in which a number of women and children had taken refuge; and it was with difficulty that the marquis del Guasto prevailed upon the savage soldiers to spare the lives of those trembling, miserable remains of the inhabitants h.

Siege of Rhineberg.

From this disaftrous scene, Farnese, now duke of Parma, by his father's death, directed his march towards Rhineberg; another place in the electorate of Cologn, of which, on account of its important fituation, the States were extremely folicitous to retain possession.

THE earl of Leicester mean while had been employed in drawing together all the forces which could be spared from the garrisons of the towns and forts, and seemed determined not to suffer any more of the campaign to pass without striking some important stroke, which might satisfy the expectations of the confederates. But as his army, which confifted only of feven thousand foot and one thousand four hundred horse, was inferior in number to the enemy, he durst not hazard an engagement; but refolved to attack fome place of importance in the possession of the Spaniards, in order to induce the duke of Parma to relinquish the fiege of Rhineberg. He directed his march towards Zutphen, and in order to facilitate his defign against that place, first attacked, and made himself master of the town of Doesburg; after which he sat down with his whole army before Zutphen, and began the siege in form.

ĪF

h Bentivoglio, part ii. lib iv.

Ir he had followed the counsel that was given Book him, to secure certain passes which led to the town, it must unavoidably have fallen into his hands; as it was neither furnished with provisions, He lays fire nor with military stores. Of this the duke of Par- to Zutphe. ma had been particularly informed by Baptisto Taili the governor; and for this reason, although he had made progress in his operations against Rhineberg, he immediately raised the siege of that. place, and hastened with all his forces to the relief of Zutphen. As he was acquainted with the extremity to which the belieged were reduced, he fent the Italian cavalry, under the marquis del Guafto, before the rest of the army, with a temporary supply; and ordered a numerous body of Spanish infantry to advance with the utmost expedition. Through Leicester's neglect to fortify the passes, a part of this supply was introduced into the towns without difficulty, in the night; and on the day following, del Guasto attempted to introduce the rest. On this occasion a fierce rencounter happened between the Italian and English cavalry. At the first onset the Italians were compelled to retire; but they foon returned to the charge. The action then became hot and obstinate, and the iffue remained for some time doubtful. Del Guafto, seconded by several officers of diffinguished reputation, made every effort that could have been expected from the most experienced commander. But the English, led on by colonel Norris and Sir Philip Sidney, proved a second time victorious, and drove the Italians before them till they reached the Spanish infantry; when the English, being ignorant whether the whole Spanish army was at hand, thought it dangerous to advance. Of the Death of Sir Italians about one hundred and fifty were killed Philipsidney and wounded, and of the English thirty. But the latter paid dear for their victory, by their irreparable loss of the brave and accomplished Sir Philip Vol. II. Sidney;

226

Book XX.

1 586.

Leicester obliged to

raile the

fiege. October 12th

Sidney; who is celebrated by his cotemporaries, as a person of the most consummate worth; and as he possessed the favour of Elizabeth, must, if it had been the will of heaven to prolong his life, have foon attained to the highest dignities in her power to bestow. Soon after this rencounter, the duke of Parma arrived with his whole army in order of battle; and Leicester, conscious of the inferiority of his forces, drew them off from the fiege, and fuffered him to enter Zutphen without opposition. Here the duke remained till he had vifited the fortifications, and laid in a fufficient quantity of ammunition and provisions; after which he repassed the Rhine, and having put garrisons into his new conquests, he set out for Brus-

Leicester takes fome forts near Zutphen.

fels.

His troops were no sooner distributed into winter-quarters, than Leicester returned with his army towards Zutphen. He did not however intend to enter so late in the year upon the siege of the town itself, but only to make himself master of three forts on the opposite side of the river. which put it in the power of the Spaniards to make frequent incursions into the territory of Veluwe. In this attempt he succeeded, and thereby deprived the Spaniards for a time of what had been the principal advantage which they derived from the possession of Zutphen. After which, having stationed a part of his troops in these forts, he returned to the Hague, where the States had been appointed to convene.

Leicester's enduct.

This affembly had no great reason to be satisarbitrary and fied with their new governor's management of the war; and they were highly discontented with his civil administration. During the course of those military operations which have been related, he had treated them in many respects rather as a conquered province, than a free state, to whose assistance he had been fent by their friend and ally; and and had shewn no less contempt of their funda- Book mental laws, to which he knew they were unalterably attached, than to the conditions of their treaty with Elizabeth. Instead of regulating his conduct by the advice of the States or council, as gratitude and prudence required, he appears to have conceived an early prejudice against all those who had diffinguished themselves in the service of their country, while he bestowed his favour on a set of artful and deligning men, of suspected fidelity, who were obsequious to his caprice.

1 586.

By their counsel, he laid such restrictions upon trade, that if the States had not interposed with vigour, would have proved fatal to it; and obliged many of those Flemish merchants who had lately fettled in Holland and Zealand, to remove into foreign parts. By the same advice, he tampered with the coin, and made such alterations in it as enriched his minions or himself, whilst they impoverished the provinces.

INNOVATIONS were introduced without the consent of the States, in the manner of collecting the public money; and after it was collected, instead of putting it, as the constitution required, into the hands of the treasurer chosen by the States. Leicester ordered it to be delivered to a treasurer of his own appointment, who refused to fatisfy the States as to the purpoles to which it was applied. Taxes were levied from the people, for paying not only all the foldiers in the garrisons, and all the country troops, but sufficient likewise for the payment of between fix and feven thoufand Germans; yet the foldiers in the garrifons were so ill paid, that the officers found it difficult to prevent a mutiny; and two thousand Germans who had enlisted under the count de Meurs, in hopes of receiving a certain furn on their arrival in the Netherlands, being disappointed, through the governor's negligence, or the corruption of those in whom he confided, returned to Germany without drawing their swords, at a time when their affistance was absolutely necessary to the success of the campaign.

HISTORY OF THE REIGN OF

In the treaty between the States and Elizabeth it had been agreed, that when any vacancy should happen in the government of a town, fort, or province, the commander in chief should fill it up with one of three persons presented to him by the States. To this agreement Leicester paid no regard, but appointed persons to governments of great importance, not only without their being named by the States, but even when the States remonstrated against his appointing them. Roland York, a Londoner, who had some years before been detected in treasonable practices, of which they gave Leicester timely information. was notwithstanding this intrusted with the charge of the principal fort near Zutphen, which commanded the country of Veluwe; and William Stanley, an English catholic, who had been in the service of Spain, was made governor of Deventer, into which place Leicester, in contradiction to the treaty with Elizabeth, had put a garrison of twelve thousand foot and two hundred horse, consisting mostly of Irish papists.

Besides these and other instances of imprudent and arbitrary conduct, he disgusted the Dutch troops by appointing English officers to command them. He compelled the people to furnish him with carriages, and to serve in his army as pioneers; and, in violation of what had ever been esteemed a fundamental privilege of the inhabitants of the Netherlands, he obliged persons, prosecuted by his tools, to leave the provinces in which they resided, and to submit to their trial in in other provinces, where their profecutors had Boo s greater influence to procure their condemnation

Such a complication of despotic measures in the government of a people jealous of their liberty, appears repugnant, whatever were the governor's motives, to the very lowest degree of prudence, of which we can suppose him to have been possessed. It is not surprising that he was fuspected of having formed a plan to suppress the affembly of the States, and to affume an absolute authority; but if his prefumption could impose upon him so far as to make him believe, that so wife a princess as Elizabeth would, from her partiality to him, and in open violation of her engagements, support his usurpation, yet his conduct was extremely ill calculated to promote this perfidious design. It disgusted all the better fort of those who had influence in the provinces, and ferved to diffuse an universal alarm, before he had taken measures proper for securing success in his attempt.

THE States however, sensible of their present The States dependence upon Elizabeth, resolved to avoid an open rupture with her favourite, and, notwithstanding what had passed, they received him on his arrival at the Hague with every mark of respect. They delivered to him a modest but firm remonstrance, and intreated him with much earnethness to redress their grievances. Leicester could not justify his conduct in any of the particulars that have been mentioned. He attempted, however, to make some apology for it, and asfured the deputies, though with little fincerity, that for the future he should be careful to avoid giving them any just ground of offence. He added, that at present he was under a necessity of pasfing over to England, on account of certain disturbances

Van Meteren, lib. xiii. Grotius, lib. v.

1 586.

Book turbances in that kingdom, which required his presence. The States were extremely surprised at this intimation, as they expected that he would have proceeded immediately to reform the abuses of which they had complained; but they were in some measure reconciled to his departure, by his agreeing to a proposal which they made to him, that till his return to the Low Countries, his authority as governor should be lodged in the council of state; and he accordingly executed a public deed to this effect on the twenty-fourth of November, although it foon afterwards appeared that he had done it only to avoid the trouble of any further folicitation upon the subject. He executed privately on the same day another deed, in which he reserved to himself an exclusive authority over all the governors of provinces, towns, and forts, and even deprived the council of state of their wonted authority. This conduct, at once so cowardly and infincere, alienated from him more than ever the affections of the States, and destroyed entirely the confidence which they had reposed in him. It confirmed the opinion of those who believed that he aspired at the sovereignty, and filled the minds of persons of all ranks with the most alarming apprehensions.

THE States had, as mentioned above; remon-Roland York strated against the trust committed to Roland and William York and William Stanley. These men gave soon a Stanley. fatal proof of the justness of the suspicions which had been entertained of their fidelity. In a few weeks after Leicester's departure for England, they entered into a treacherous correspondence with Baptisto Tassi, governor of Zutphen, and began to prepare their measures for delivering to him the important fortresses which had been intrusted to their care. The council of state received intelligence of their perfidious design; but they had not power to hinder them from putting

HISTORY OF THE REIGN OF

Book XXI. 1587. Dake of Parma's epinion.

250

THE duke of Parma, whom Philip consulted on this occasion, was of the same opinion as Idiaquez; and added, That before the king could enter upon the English expedition with a probability of success, it was necessary to acquire possession of some of the most considerable sea-ports in Zealand, for the accommodation of his sleet.

Rejected by Philip.

PHILIP was not naturally either bold or rash: yet he refused to listen to these prudent counsels. Blinded by the splendid success of his arms in the conquest of Portugal, he thought it impossible that Elizabeth could withstand the powerful armament which he intended to employ against her. And if England were subdued, the reduction of his revolted subjects would quickly follow, as they would then be deprived of the only foreign aid, by which they had been hitherto enabled to perfift in their rebellion. Nor would the conquest of the former, he thought, be either so tedious or so difficult as that of the latter: because England was every where an open country, and the English, trusting to their insular situation, had neglected to provide any fortified towns to retard the progress of an enemy. A fingle battle by sea, and another by land, would decide the contest; and as the fleet which he was preparing was greatly superior to any which Elizabeth could equip, so he could not suppose that land-forces, undisciplined, and unaccustomed to war, would be able to reful his veteran troops, which had been long enured to victory, and were commanded by the greatest general and the bravest officers in the world.

to prevent him from carrying it into execution. Book The emperor of Germany was his friend and ally. The attention of the northern potentates was wholly engroffed with the internal administration of their dominions. And the French monarch, who was more deeply interested than any other in opposing him, could with difficulty support him. felf upon the throne against his rebellious subjects.

1587.

Bur there was nothing which contributed more to confirm him in his purpole, than the approbation which it received from the pope b; who, although it has been afferted that no person entertained a higher admiration of the character of Elizabeth, confidered her as the most formidable enemy that the church had ever feen upon a throne. She had not indeed, on any occasion, treated her catholic subjects with that inhuman cruelty, of which Philip had let her an example in his treatment of the protestants; but the had thewn herfelf intent on extirpating the catholic religion from every country in Europe, to which her power and influence could reach. For almost thirty years she had been the chief support of the protestants in Germany, the Netherlands, and France. She had entirely abolished the popish faith in Scotland, as well as in her own dominions; and not fatisfied with depriving the unfortunate Mary of her liberty, she had lately after the farce of a folemn trial, ordered that princess to be condemned as a traitor, and to fuffer death. This action, for which Elizabeth was severely censured by protestants as well as papilts, excited in the violent mind of the pontiff, the highest degree of rage and indignati-With these passions his interest concurred; and the hope of seeing England, which had formerly formerly been the most precious jewel of the triple crown, brought back to its ancient obedience to the Holy See. He approved highly therefore of Philip's intended enterprize, exhorted him to persevere in his design, and gave him assurances that he would be friend him in the execution of it to the utmost of his power. Next to an insatiable thirst after dominion, it had ever been Philip's principal ambition to be considered as the guardian of the church; and his vanity was not a little flattered at this time with having the sovereign pontiff for his associate.

> Sixtus V.

: .2

Artifice of HE proceeded therefore with much alacrity in Philip to de-completing his preparations. But although he receive Eliza-folved to spare no expence or pains to secure success; yet, that he might find Elizabeth unprepared, he concealed with care the purpose for which his armament was intended. A part of his fleet, he said, was to co-operate with his land-forces in the reduction of Holland, and the rest to be employed in the desence of his dominions in America.

ELIZABETH had too much penetration to be so easily deceived by the artifices of a prince, with whole duplicity the was to thoroughly acquainted; and in the fpring of the year 1587, she sent Sir Francis Drake with a fleet to the coast of Spain to interrupt his preparations. By this gallant seaman, the Spanish Ships of war which had been sent to oppole him were dispersed, and near a hundred veffels filled with naval stores and provisions, befides two large galleons, were destroyed in the harbour of Cadiz. Drake then set sail for the Azores, where he took a rich carrac in her way from the East Indies, and afterwards returned to England loaden with spoils, having by this bold and fortunate adventure rendered it impossible for c Bentivoglio, part ii. lib. iv. See a very different account in Gregorio Leti's Life of Sixtus, lib. vii.

Digitized by Google

for Philip to execute his enterprize against Eng. Book. land till the following year.

1587.

NOTWITHSTANDING these hostilities, Philip 1537. still affected to defire that all the grounds of dif-gociation for ference between him and Elizabeth might be re-peace. moved, and gave orders to the duke of Parma to propose a negociation for peace. It is not probable that the queen was deceived by this, any more than by his former artifice. She resolved however to appear to be caught in the fnare: she pretended to believe his declaration with regard to the destination of his seet, and to listen to his proposal of negociating an agreement. She readily accepted of the mediation of the king of Denmark; and that her conduct might have the greater appearance of fincerity, the urged the States to fend ambaffadors to Bourbourg, the place appointed for the conferences, and ordered her envoy to represent to them the expediency of putting a period to the war.

THE States were much alarmed with her proposal, and suspected that, in order to avert the storm which threatened her, she had resolved to facrifice the confederacy, and to deliver up to Philip the Dutch towns in her possession. found it necessary to remove their apprehensions on this head, by declaring, that as the had not the remotest thoughts of forsaking them, so she would never confent to any terms of peace inconfistent with their security.

SHE could not however persuade them to send ambassadors to the congress. "They were deeply fensible, they informed her, of the weight of those considerations which her ambassador had urged to induce them to think of peace. lamented that spirit of discord which had seized on some towns of the confederacy, and they heard, with great anxiety, of those mighty fleets and armies 1587.

Book armies which the king of Spain was preparing for their destruction. But their situation, though bad in some respects, was far from being desperate; they were still in possession of more than fixty towns and forts, each of which could make a vigorous relistance against the enemy. In the two years during which the earl of Leicester had governed them, eight millions of guilders had been raised for the public service, and under a prudent administration they would be able not only to continue to afford the same expence, but even to augment it. But although their situation were in reality as ill as some had represented, it could not ferve any good purpose to treat of peace with the king of Spain, who was unalterably determined never to grant them peace on fuch conditions as either their interest or their consciences would permit them to accept. And from past experience they were persuaded, that their sending ambassadors to the congress would be attended with the most pernicious consequences. It would create in many persons such despair with regard to the stability of the present government, as would determine some to change their religion, and others to leave the Netherlands. It would raise the spirits of the catholics, and induce both them and the protestants to withhold their share of the public expences; the former, from the view of forwarding the peace, and the latter, from that of retiring into foreign parts. Thus, both the fleet and the army being ill paid, would become refractory. the commanders of towns and ships would provide for their future security, by entering into secret practices with the enemy; and in the midst of that sedition, confusion, and treachery that would enfue, it would not be in the power of the States. or of the queen, to prevent the people from accepting whatever terms of peace the king of Spain should think fit to impose.

255

XXI.

1587.

In these reasons Elizabeth found it necessary to Book acquiesce; but she persisted in the resolution which she had formed with regard to her own conduct, and ordered her ambassadors to repair to Bourbourg. In the conferences held there, various terms of accommodation were proposed, with no fincerity on the part of Spain, and with little hope of success on the part of England. Spanish ministers still continued to assure those of England that no invasion of that kingdom was intended; and, considering how long this congress sublisted (for it was not dissolved till the arrival of the Spanish fleet in the channel), it should seem that their affeverations were not wholly difregarded by Elizabeth 4.

This artifice however did not prevent her from Elizabeth's putting her kingdom into a posture of defence. Preparations

An army was raised amounting to eighty thousand men, twenty thousand of whom were stationed on the fouth coast of the island, twenty-two thoufand foot and a thousand horse were posted at Tilbury, in Essex, under the earl of Leicester. and the remainder, commanded by lord Hunfdown, were kept near the queen's person, in readiness to march against the enemy wheresoever they should attempt to land. Elizabeth did not trust implicitly at this juncture either to her own judgment, or that of her counsellors of state: lord Gray of Wilton, fir Francis Knolles, Sir John Norris, fir Richard Bingham, and fir Roger Williams, officers of distinguished reputation, were appointed to confider of the measures proper to be pursued; and by their advice, all the sea-ports which lay most conveniently for a descent were fortified; the militia was raised, their arms and manner of fighting ascertained, and a resolution formed that if, notwithstanding the precautions taken, it should be found impossible to prevent the enemy from landing, all the country round d Meteren, lib. ziv. p. 459. Bentivoglio, part ii. lib. iv.

Digitized by Google

HISTORY OF THE REIGN OF

256 Book XXI.

should be laid waste, and a general engagement avoided till the several armies were combined.

1588.

WHILE these prudent measures were pursued at land, Elizabeth exerted herself strenuously in the equipment of her fleet. When she began her preparations, it did not amount to more than thirty ships, and none of these were nearly equal in fize to those of the enemy. But this disadvantage was in some measure compensated by the skill and dexterity of the English sailors; and the number of her ships was soon augmented through the alacrity and zeal which her subjects displayed in her defence. By her wife administration she had acquired their efteem and confidence. mosity against her person and government, which the differences in religion had excited in the minds of some, was at present swallowed up in that univerial abhorrence which the catholics as well as the protestants entertained of the tyranny of Spain, Great pains were taken to keep alive and heighten that abhorrence. Accounts were spread of the horrid barbarities which the Spaniards had perpetrated in the Netherlands and America: descriptions were drawn, in the blackest colours, of the inhuman cruelties of the inquisition, and pictures were dispersed of the various instruments of torture employed by the inquisitors, of which, it was faid, there was abundant store on board the Spanish fleet. These, and such other consideratio s, made a strong impression not upon Elizabeth's protestant subjects only, but likewife upon the catholics ; who, although the pope had published a bull of excommunication against her, yet resolved not to yield to the protestants either in loyalty to their sovereign, or in zeal for the independency of the state. The whole kingdom was of one mind and spirit: some catholics

e Meteren, lib. zv.

tholics entered into the army as volunteers, and Book XXI. others joined with the protestants in equipping armed vessels. Every maritime town fitted out The citizens of London furnished one or more. thirty, although only fifteen were required of them; and between forty and fifty were equipped by the nobility and gentry throughout the kingdom. But all these ships were of small size, in comparison of those which composed the Spanish fleet; and there was still much ground for the most anxious apprehensions with regard to the final issue of the war.

No person felt greater anxiety on this occasion than Elizabeth; the principal object of whose prudent politics for thirty years, had been to avoid the critical fituation to which she was now reduced. She did not, however, fuffer any fymptoms of uneasiness to appear, but wore at all times a placid and animated countenance, and in her whole behaviour displayed an undaunted spirit, which commanded admiration and applause.

THE States of Holland, in the mean time, were Preparatinot inattentive to the approaching danger, nor duct of the did they think themselves less interested to provide Dutch. against it, than if Philip had intended to begin his operations with an attack upon the Netherlands. From their fears of an immediate attack, they were delivered by intelligence of the enormous fize of the Spanish ships, to which the coasts of Holland and Zealand were inaccessible. They turned their principal attention therefore to the affiftance of their ally: and kept their fleet, confisting of more than eighty ships, ready for action. Elizabeth's defire, they fent thirty of that number to cruize between Calais and Dover; and, afterwards, when the duke of Parma's design of transporting his army to England was certainly known, they ordered Justin de Nassau, admiral of Zealand, to join lord Seymour, one of the Vol. II. K k English

Digitized by Google

256 1588.

HISTORY OF THE REIGN OF

Book thould be laid wafte, and a general engagement avoided till the feveral armies were combined.

> WHILE these prudent measures were pursued at land, Elizabeth exerted herfelf strenuously in the equipment of her fleet. When she began her preparations, it did not amount to more than thirty thips, and none of these were nearly equal in fize to those of the enemy. But this disadvantage was in some measure compensated by the skill and dexterity of the English failors; and the number of her thips was foon augmented through the alacrity and zeal which her subjects displayed in her defence. By her wife administration the had acquired their effeem and confidence. The animosity against her person and government, which the differences in religion had excited in the minds of some, was at present swallowed up in that univerial abhorrence which the catholics as well as the protestants entertained of the tyranny of Spain. Great pains were taken to keep alive and heighten that abhorrence. Accounts were spread of the horrid barbarities which the Spaniards had perpetrated in the Netherlands and America: descriptions were drawn, in the blackest colours, of the inhuman cruelties of the inquifition, and pictures were dispersed of the various instruments of torture employed by the inquisitors, of which, it was faid, there was abundant store on board the Spanish sleet. These, and such other consideratio s, made a strong impression not upon Elizabeth's protestant subjects only, but likewise upon the catholics; who, although the pope had published a bull of excommunication against her, yet resolved not to yield to the protestants either in loyalty to their sovereign, or in zeal for the independency of the state. The whole kingdom was of one mind and spirit : some ca> > e Meteren, lib. zv.

Digitized by

PHIL

tholies ente others joine armed veffe STORT TO SHO thirty, altho them; and by the nob dom. But comparifon feer; and most anxiou iffue of the

No person than Elizab andent po avoid the cr reduced, SI toms of unes a placid any whole beha which comm

THE State not inattent did they this sout it, t operations v F_{rom} their ac deliver of the Span and Z ed their prin of more tha Dizabeth's by to cruiz traids, w gniporting hown, the of Zealand Aor. II

HISTORY OF THE REIGN OF

English admirals, with five and thirty ships, to block up those sea-ports in Flanders where the duke intended to embark .

THE principal English sleet was stationed at Plymouth, and the chief command of it was given to Charles lord Howard of Essingham, who had under him as vice-admirals, Sir Francis Drake, Hawkins, and Frobisher, three of the most expert and bravest seamen in the world.

The Spanish Armada.

258

In the beginning of May 1588, Philip's preparations, which had so long kept all Europe in amazement and suspense, were brought to a conclusion. That Armada, to which the Spaniards, in the confidence of fuccess, gave the name of Invincible, confifted of one hundred and fifty ships, most of which were greatly superior in strength and size to any that had been seen before. It had on board near twenty thousand soldiers, and eight thousand sailors, besides two thousand volunteers of the most distinguished families in Spain. It carried two thoufand fix hundred and fifty great guns, was victualled for half a year, and contained such a quantity of military stores, as only the Spanish monarch, enriched by the treasures of the Indies and America, could supply.

Duke of Parma's preparations.

PHILIP's preparations in the Netherlands were not less advanced than those in Spain. Besides a shourishing army of thirty thousand foot and four thousand horse, which the duke of Parma had assembled in the neighbourhood of Nieuport and Dunkirk; that active general had, with incredible labour, provided a great number of slat-bottomed vessels, fit for transporting both horse and foot, and had brought sailors to navigate them from the towns in the Baltic. Most of these vessels had been built at Antwerp, and as he durst not venture to bring bring them from thence by sea to Nieuport, lest Book they should have been intercepted by the Dutch, he was obliged to fend them along the Scheld to Ghent, from Ghent to Bruges, by the canal which joins these towns, and from Bruges to Nieuport. by a new canal which he dug on the present occasion. This laborious undertaking, in which several thousand workmen had been employed, was already finished, and the duke now waited for the arrival of the Spanish fleet; hoping, that as soon as it should approach, the Dutch and English ships that cruifed upon the coast, would retire into their harbours.

XXI. 1588.

THE Armada would have left Lisbon in the be-Death of the Spanish adginning of May, but the marquis de Santa Croce, miral, who had been appointed admiral, was, at the very time fixed for its departure, seized with a violent fever, of which he died in a few days; and, by a fingular fatality, the duke de Paliano, the viceadmiral, died likewise at the same time. Croce being reckoned the first naval officer in Spain. Philip had much reason to lament his death, and it should seem that he found it extremely difficult to fill his place, fince he named for his fucceffor the duke de Medina-Sidonia, a nobleman of confiderable reputation, but entirely unacquainted with maritime affairs. This defect in the commander in chief, Philip supplied in some measure, by giving him Martinez de Recaldo, a seaman of great experience, for his vice-admiral.

In these arrangements so much time was lost, The Armathat the fleet could not leave Lisbon till the 29th of from Lisbon. May. It had not advanced far in its voyage to Corunna, at which place it was to receive some troops and stores, when it was overtaken by a violent storm and dispersed. All the ships however reached Corunna, though confiderably damaged, Kk 2 except ı 588.

260 HISTORY OF THE REIGN OF

Book except four f. They were repaired with the utmost diligence, the king sending messengers every day to hasten their departure; yet several weeks passed before they could be put in a condition to refume the voyage.

> In the mean time a report was brought to England, that the Armada had suffered so much by the storm, as to be unfit for proceeding in the intended enterprize; and so well attested did this intelligence appear to queen Elizabeth, that, at her desire, secretary Walsingham wrote to the English admiral, requiring him to lay up four of his largest ships, and to discharge the seamen. Lord Howard was happily less credulous on this occasion than either Elizabeth or Walfingham, and defired that he might be allowed to retain these ships in the service, even though it should be at his own expence, till more certain information were receiv-In order to procure it, he set sail with a brisk north wind for Corunna, intending, in case he should find the Armada so much disabled as had been reported, to attempt to complete its destruction. On the coast of Spain he received intelligence of the truth: at the same time the wind having changed from north to fouth, he began to dread that the Spaniards might have failed for England, and therefore he returned without delay to his former station at Plymouth.

Arrival of Soon after his arrival, he was informed that the the Armada in the chan. Armada was in fight. He immediately weighed anchor, and failed out of the harbour, still uncertain of the course which the enemy intended to July 30th, purfue. On the next day he perceived them steering directly towards him, drawn up in the form

f In three of these, the galley-slaves, consisting of English, French, and Turks, taking advantage of the confusion occafioned by the storm, overpowered the Spaniards, and carried the ships into a harbour on the coast of Bayonne. Meteren, p. 476. Digitized by Google of a crescent, which extended seven miles from Book one extremity to another. It was for some time believed that Plymouth was the place of their destination; and it was the opinion of many perfons in that age, that their enterprize would have been more successful than it proved, had they landed there, and not proceeded up the channel. By doing this, it was supposed, they would have drawn Elizabeth's whole force to the fouth-west coast of the island, and have rendered it easier for the duke of Parma to transport his troops. But in this expectation it is probable they would have been extremely disappointed, as the Dutch fleet alone would have been able to block up the seaports in Flanders; the English fleet might have destroyed the Armada had it once entered Plymouth harbour, and Elizabeth's land forces would have been an over-match for all the Spanish troops which the Armada had on board. But if the duke Plan of opede Medina ever intended to make a descent at Ply-rations pre-fested by mouth, he foon changed his defign, and adhered Philip. closely afterwards to the execution of a plan prescribed to him by the court of Spain. to steer quite through the channel till he should reach the coast of Flanders, and after driving away the Dutch and English ships, by which the harbours of Nieuport and Dunkirk were belieged, to escort the duke of Parma's army to England, and to land there the forces that were on board the In compliance with these instructions, he proceeded in his course, without turning aside to the English, who were drawn up along the coast, and ready to receive him.

LORD Howard, confidering that the Spaniards gallant conwould probably be much superior to him in close and of lord fight, by reason of the size of their ships, and the Howard. number of their troops, wisely resolved to content himself with harassing them in their voyage, and with watching attentively all the advantages which might 1588.

Digitized by Google

XXI. 1 588.

Book might be derived from storms, cross winds, and such like fortuitous accidents. It was not long before he discerned a favourable opportunity of attacking the vice-admiral Recaldo. This he did in person; and on that occasion displayed so much dexterity in working his ship, and in loading and firing his guns, as greatly alarmed the Spaniards for the fate of the vice-admiral. From that time they kept much closer to one another; notwithstanding which, the English on the same day attacked one of the largest galeasses. Other Spanish ships came up in time to her relief, but in their hurry, one of the principal galleons, which had a great part of the treasure on board, ran foul of another ship, and had one of her masts broken. In consequence of this misfortune she fell behind, and was taken by fir Francis Drake; who, on the same day, took another capital ship, which had been accidentally fet on fire.

Superiority of the English sailors.

SEVERAL other rencounters happened, and in all of them the English proved victorious, through the great advantage which they derived from the lightness of their ships, and the dexterity of the The Spaniards in that age did not fufficiently understand nautical mechanics, to be able to avail themselves of the unusual magnitude of their The English sailed round them, approached or retired with a velocity that filled them with amazement, and did infinitely greater execution with their cannon; for while every shot of theirs proved effectual, their ships suffered very little damage from the enemy, whose guns were planted too high, and generally spent their force in air.

The Armada prpolite to Calais.

THE Spaniards however still continued to advance till they came opposite to Calais: there the duke de Medina having ordered them to cast anchor, he fent information to the duke of Parma of his his arrival, and intreated him to hasten the em- Book barkation of his forces. Farnese set out immedi- XXI. ately from Bruges, where the messenger found him, for Nieuport, and he began to put his troops on board. But at the same time he informed Medina, that, agreeably to the king's instructions, the vesfels which he had prepared, were proper only for transporting the troops, but were utterly unfit for fighting, and for this reason, till the Armada were brought still nearer, and the coast cleared of the Dutch ships which had blocked up the harbours of Nieuport and Dunkirk, he could not stir from his present station, without exposing his army to certain ruin, the consequence of which would probably be the entire loss of the Netherlands.

1588.

In compliance with this request, the Armada was Is thrown ordered to advance, and it had arrived within fight into confusof Dunkirk, between the English sleet on the one English sirehand, and the Dutch on the other, when a sudden ships. calm put a stop to all its motions. In this situation the three fle ts remained for one whole About the middle of the night a breeze sprung up, August 7th. and lord Howard had recourse to an expedient which had been happily devised on the day before. Having filled eight ships with pitch, sulphur, and other combustible materials, he set fire to them and fent them before the wind against the different divisions of the Spanish sleet.

WHEN the Spaniards beheld these ships in slames approaching towards them, it brought to their remembrance the havock which had been made by the fireships employed against the duke of Parma's bridge at the siege of Antwerp. The darkness of the night increased the terror with which their imaginations were overwhelmed, and the panic flew from one end of the fleet to the other. Each crew, anxious only for their own preservation, thought of 264

Book of nothing but how to escape from the present danger. Some of them took time to weigh their anchors, but others cut their cables, and suffered 1588. their ships to drive with blind precipitation, without confidering whether they did not thereby expose themselves to a greater danger than that which they were so solicitous to avoid. In this confusion the ships ran foul of one another; the shock was dreadful, and several of them received so much damage as to be rendered unfit for future use.

Battle between the two feets.

WHEN day-light returned, lord Howard had the satisfaction to perceive that his stratagem had fully produced the defired effect. The enemy were still in extreme disorder, and their ships widely separated and dispersed. His fleet had lately received a great augmentation by the ships fitted out by the nobility and gentry, and by those under lord Seymour, who had left Justin de Nassau as alone sufficient to guard the coast of Flanders. Being bravely seconded by Sir Francis Drake, and all the other officers, he made hafte to improve the advantage which was now presented to him, and attacked the enemy in different quarters at the fame time with the utmost impetuosity and ardour. August 8th. The engagement began at four in the morning, and lasted till six at night. The Spaniards displayed in every rencounter the most intrepid bravery; but, from the causes already mentioned, they did very little execution against the English, while many of their own ships were greatly damaged, and ten of the largest were either run aground, or funk, or compelled to furrender.

Loffes fultained by the Spaniards.

THE principal galeass, commanded by Moncada, having Mauriquez the inspector-general on board, with three hundred galley-flaves and four hundred foldiers, was driven ashore near Calais. quickly followed by some English pinnaces, and 4bele these were supported by the admiral's long boat, in which he had fent a body of select soldiers to their affistance. Moncada himself, and almost all the Spaniards, were either killed or drowned in attempting to reach the shore. The rowers were set at liberty. About fifty thousand ducats were found on board. Mauriquez escaped, and was the first who carried the news of the disaster of the fleet to Spain.

One of the capital ships having been long battered by an English captain of the name of Cross. was funk in the time of the engagement. A few only of the crew were faved, who related, that one of the officers on board having proposed to surrender, he was killed by another who was enraged at his proposal; that this other was killed by the brother of the first; and that it was in the midst of this bloody scene, which paints the ferocious character of the Spaniards, that the ship had gone to the bottom .

THE fate of two other of the Spanish galleons is particularly mentioned by the cotemporary historians. One of them was called the St. Philip, and the other the St. Matthew, which had on board, belides leveral other nobility, two general officers, Don Francis Toledo, of the family of Orgas, and Don Diego Pimentel, brother to the marquis of Tomnarez. After an obstinate engagement, in which the admiral's ship fought along with them, they were obliged to run ashore on the coast of Flanders, where they were taken by the Dutch. Toledo was drowned, and Pimentel, and all the rest who survived, were made prisoners.

THE duke de Medina was much dejected at The duke de these missortunes, and still more when he re-spains of such flected on the superior skill of the enemy. Forces.

it

266

Book XXI. which had passed since the first appearance of the Armada in the channel, the English had lost only one small ship, and about a hundred men. Animated by their past success with sanguine hopes of final victory, they were now more formidable than ever. Medina dreaded, from a continuance of the combat, the entire destruction of his sleet. He could not without the greatest danger remain any longer in his present situation, and much less could he venture to approach any nearer to the coast of Flanders.

Couse of his IT now appeared how great an error Philip had despair. committed, in neglecting to fecure fome commodious harbours in Zealand. He had from the first supposed that the enemy's ships would fly to their respective ports, as soon as his stupendous Armada should appear. But this Armada had been made unfit for the purpose for which it was designed, by means of that enormous expence which he bestowed in order to render it invincible. In constructing it, no attention had been given to the nature of those narrow seas in which it was to be employed; and the consequence of this important error was, that even if the English fleet had been unable to contend with the Spaniards in the deeper parts of the channel, yet they would have prevented them from landing; and the Dutch fleet lying in shallow water, to which the Galleons durst not approach, would still have kept their station, and have rendered it impossible for the Spanish sleet and army to act in concert.

He refolves This the duke of Medina at length perceived, to return to and he did not helitate in resolving to abandon the further prosecution of his enterprise. The only subject of his deliberation now was, how he might, with with the least difficulty and danger, get back to Spain. Had he been ever fo much inclined to return through the channel, in which he must have been continually haraffed by the enemy, yet the wind, which blew strong from the fouth, would have prevented him. He therefore resolved to fail northwards, and to make the circuit of the British isles.

PHILIP II. KING OF SPAIN.

267 Book XXI. 1588.

This resolution was no sooner understood by the English admiral, than having dispatched lord Seymour with a part of the fleet, to join the Dutch in watching the motions of the duke of Parma, he fet sail himself with the greater part of it, in purfuit of the Spaniards. He followed close in their rear for three days; without attacking them. This he declined from the apprehension of his not having a sufficient quantity of gun-powder, with which he had been ill supplied by the public offices, Had he not been deterred from renewing his attack by this provoking circumstance, he might have forced the Spaniards to an engagement off Flamborough-head; and it is afferted by a respectable cotemporary historian h, that so great was the distress of the Spanish fleet, and such the admiral's dread of the long and dangerous voyage before him, that he would have furrendered without resistance, in case he had been attacked. But he was faved from the difference in which this action would have involved his name, through the necessity under which the English admiral found himself of returning to England, to supply the deficiency of his stores.

LORD Howard had reason to be incensed against Differen those, by whose negligence he was thus disabled which befell the Armada. from completing the glory which his gallant conduct had procured him. In the issue, however, Book it would have been unfortunate, if he had delayed his return. The two fleets failing in opposite directions, were not far distant from each other, when a dreadful storm arose. The English reached home, though not without difficulty, yet without sustaining any considerable loss. But the Spaniards were exposed to the storm in all its rage, and became no less objects of pity to their enemies, than they had lately been of dread and terror. Having hitherto kept near each other, lest the English should have renewed the attack, this circumstance proved the first cause of their disasters. The ships were driven violently against each other, and thereby many of them were rendered an easy prey to the fury of the waves. At length they were dispersed. In order to enable them to ride out the ftorm, the horses, mules, and baggage were thrown over-board. This precaution was of advantage only to fuch of the ships as were stronger. or more fortunate than the rest. Some of them were dashed to pieces on the rocks of Norway, or funk in the middle of the ocean. Others were thrown upon the coasts of Scotland, and the Western Isles. And more than thirty were driven by another from, which overtook them from the west, on different parts of the coasts of Ireland. Of these, some afterwards reached home in the most shattered condition, under the vice-admiral Ricaldo; others were shipwrecked among the rocks and shallows; and of those which reached the shore, the crews were barbarously murdered; from an apprehension, it was pretended, that in a country where there were fo many disaffected catholics, it would have been dangerous to shew mercy to so great a number of the enemy. The duke de Medina having kept out in the open seas, escaped shipwreck, and arrived at Saint Andero in Biscay about the end of September.

IXX. 1 588.

THE

THE calamities of the Spaniards did not end Book with their arrival in Spain. Two of the galleons which had withstood the storm, were accidentally fet on fire, and confumed to ashes in the harbour. Great numbers, especially of the nobility and gentry, accustomed to a life of ease and pleasure, had died at sea; and many more died afterwards of diseases occasioned by the hardships they had undergone.

VERY different accounts are given by different historians, of the total loss sustained. Some affert that it amounted to thirty-two ships, and ten thoufand men; but others without pretending to ascertain the number of men, which could not, they fay, be less than fifteen thousand, affirm that more than eighty ships were taken, destroyed, or lost i. This dreadful calamity was fenfibly felt all over Spain, and there was scarcely a single family of rank in the kingdom that did not go into mourning for the death of some near relation; insomuch that Philip dreading the effect which this universal face of forrow might produce upon the minds of the people, imitated the conduct of the Roman fenate, and published an edict to abridge the time of public mourning k.

WHILE the people of Spain were thus over-Rejoicings whelmed with affliction, there was nothing to be and Holland. heard in England and the united provinces but the voice of festivity and joy. In Holland medals were struck in commemoration of the happy event;

Meteren, lib. xiv. Grotii Historia, lib. i. Campana Dead. vii. lib, i. Ferreras and Thuanus.

i As the president de Thou, who lived at the time of this memorable event, pretends not to determine to which of these relations the greatest regard is due, it would be in vain at inis time to attempt to decide betwirt them.

Book and in both countries, days of folern thanksgiving to Heaven were appointed for their deliverance. Elizabeth went for this purpose to St. Paul's cathedral, seated in a triumphal chariot, and surrounded with her ministers and nobles, amidst a great number of flags and colours which had been taken from the enemy; while the citizens were ranged in arms on each fide of the streets through which she passed. Nor did the destruction of the Armada give joy only to the English and Dutch. All Europe had trembled at the thoughts of its success. although it can hardly be supposed that Philip was fo romantic as to flatter himself with the hopes of attaining universal monarchy, yet it is not to be imagined that he aspired only at the conquest of England and Holland. He had before this time formed the plan, which he afterwards pursued, of fubduing France. Nor can it be believed that any thing less would have satisfied his ambition, than the subjection of every protestant state in Europe, and the utter extirpation of the reformed religion.

Philip's magnanimous

270

XXI.

1588.

His ambition was, on this occasion, severely But as he possessed in a high degree behaviour, mortified. the art of concealing his emotions, he received intelligence of the disafter that had befallen him, with an appearance of magnanimity and refignation to the will of Heaven, which, if it was not affected, deserved the highest praise. He returned thanks to God, that the calamity was not greater. He issued orders to have the utmost care taken of the fick and wounded who had furvived the general catastrophe. And instead of forbidding the duke de Medina Sidonia to come to court, as is alleged by some historians, he wrote to him in the most obliging terms, expressing his gratitude for the zeal which he had discovered in his fervice; and observing, that no man could answer for

Perreras, part xv. Strada, lib. v.

vidence

272

XXI. 1588. vidence of Heaven, so conspicuously exercised in her behalf, faved her from the confequences with which this unjustifiable step might have been attended. It was perhaps the only imprudent meafure of which, at this difficult crisis, she can be justly accused; and she fully atoned for it by the wisdom, vigour, and fortitude which she displayed in every other part of her conduct.

PART II.

Elizabeth.

Situation of T LIZABETH's fituation now was extremely C different from what it had ever been fince her accession to the throne. Having been delivered some time before the present period from the queen of Scots, who had long been a principal cause of her inquietude; she had found the art of appealing the resentment, and even of conciliating the favour, of the fon of that unfortunate princess. had united her catholic and protestant subjects in her defence, and had triumphed over her implacable enemy the king of Spain. She had not the same reason as formerly to dread the power of that monarch, which he had exerted in vain for her destruction, and she had very little reason to apprehend that he would foon renew his attempt to invade her dominions. To prevent this, by furnishing him with employment elsewhere, had been long her principal motive for taking such deep concern in the affairs of the Netherlands. This motive did not sublist in the same degree of force as formerly, yet the resolved to adhere faithfully to her engagements with the States, and still to assist and support them. After Leicester's relignation, she had conferred the command of her troops in the Netherlands upon lord Willoughby, Subjecting this nobleman, however.

Lord Willoughby.

Digitized by Google

PHILIP II. KING OF SPAIN.

273 however to the authority of the states, and leaving Book the command in chief to prince Maurice, to whom the States themselves had lately committed it.

1588.

It was not gratitude alone, or a respect for the Prince Maumemory of the late prince of Orange, that deter-rice. mined the confederated provinces to repole to great a trust at this perilous conjuncture in his son, who was at this time only in the twenty-first year of his age. Maurice had, from his earliest youth, given proof of superior prudence and capacity; and his conduct afterwards fulfilled the most sanguine expectations of his countrymen, with much less moderation and self-command, and less too of the art of governing the minds of men, which William possessed in so eminent a degree, Maurice was superior to his father in military accomplishments, and of these the confederacy stood more in need at the present period, than of political abilities.

MAURICE had no opportunity of exercifing his talents for war, from the time of Leicester's departure till the fate of the Spanish Armada was decided. A great number of his best troops had been put on board the fleet commanded by Justin de Nassau; all the garrisons of the maritime towns had been augmented, left the Spaniards should have attempted to make a descent; and there was no body of forces left, sufficient to enable him to take advantage of the duke of Parma's inactivity, by undertaking any military enterprize.

THE first opportunity of action was afforded him The duke of by a resolution which the duke formed, as soon as tates the he perceived there was no longer any prospect of siege of invading England, to beliege the town of Bergen-Bergen-opop-Zoom. This town, as its name imports, is situated on the river Zoom, at a little distance from the place where that river falls into the Scheld: Vol. II. Т and

274

XXI.

1588.

Book and by this last river the territory of Bergen is separated from the isle of Tolen. Farnese thinking it necessary towards the success of his intended enterprize, to be master of this island, sent count Charles of Mansvelt with a body of eight hundred foot to take possession of it; and in order to conceal his defign, he ordered them to make a feint of marching towards Heusden. This artifice however had not the defired success. Maurice had taken care to have both Bergen and Tolen properly furnished with troops for their defence.

> AT low water it is practicable to pass over to Tolen upon foot, and in this way count Mansvelt endeavoured to approach it. But the governor, count Solmes, was fo well prepared to receive him, that Mansvelt was soon obliged to abandon his attempt, and in his retreat he loft about four hundred men. In the mean time the duke of Parma had advanced with his army, and invested the town on the land side, without having met with any confiderable opposition. But the besieged beheld his operations with great indifference; their -communication with Holland and Zealand was still as free and open as before. In order to intercept it, they knew that the enemy must first reduce two strong forts which stood between the town and the Scheld, and this they trusted could not be accomplished before the approach of winter.

October.

He is deceived by two British foldiers.

THE duke immediately began his operations with an attack upon one of these forts; but before he had made any confiderable progress, he conceived hopes of acquiring possession of it in a way much more easy and expeditious than by open force. Two foldiers belonging to the garrison, whom some historians call Scots, and others English, having gone over to Farnese, offered to deliver the fort to him, on condition of his granting them them a suitable reward for so great a service. Far- B o o x nese lent a willing ear to their proposal, and gave them the most flattering promises; but as he still fuspected them of infincerity, he made them confirm what they had told him by an oath, and required that they should be carried bound in the midst of the soldiers whom he intended to employ in executing the plan which they had suggested. To this, as well as to the oath required from them, they readily agreed. The duke could no longer remain distrustful, and ordered De Leyva, one of his bravest officers, to be ready immediately after fun-fet with three thouland infantry, to advance towards the fort. De Leyva set out at the time appointed, and arrived at the gate when it was beginning to grow dark. Upon a fignal given by the two British soldiers the port was opened, but no fooner had about fifty of the Spaniards entered, than the portcullis was let down, and all the rest excluded. Those who had entered perceived the treachery of their guides, but being more folicitous to fave their own lives than to take vengeance on the traitors, they suffered them to escape, and the Spaniards themselves were instantly surrounded by the garrison, and either put to the sword or taken prisoners.

XXI. 1588.

Or those who were without, only such as were near the gate were acquainted with what had happened, while the rest who were ignorant of it still pressing forward, made it impossible for the foremost to retire. These men, rendered desperate by their perilous lituation, attempted to scale the ramparts, but they were foon repulsed by the garrison, who were every where upon their guard. The guns of the fort began to play upon them. The darkness of the night increased their confusion, and they fell into an ambush which the garrison had T 2 prepared.

g-é

Fire present. A great number was killed, and many was five free free up to the mind and water with seals.

Lewis in makening in his enterprize. Heavy must tail many fallen, his tro ps were begun to grow funcy, and all the country round, which was naturally were, was necessarized inacceffible to his converse of Francisca. Determined by these confidentialists, he rather the first before the middle of November, after facilitying some passes in the resign nominated of the place, to reftrain the excessions of the gentles.

No former had he drawn off his troops from Berger, they having put the Italians and Spaniards with with country, he fent the Germans under count Peter Emefi de Manívelt to lay fiege to Washierdonck, in Upper Guelderland, a imall pace, but foregiv forefied, and fittiated in the miest of a marthy soil. Farnese was, notwithstanding these circumstances, determined to employ his troops in reducing it, by loud complaints which were made to him of the continual depredations of the garrison. This garrison consisted of troops formed by the celebrated Schenck, whose bravery would have baffled the utmost efforts of count Mansvelt, had it not been for a circumstance which intitles the fiege of this little town to a place in history. It was in this siege that bombs, the late invention of an inhabitant of Venlo, were first employed. To fave the town from destruction, the citizens prevailed on the garrison to consent to a furrender, but not till they had fallied out and killed a great number of the enemy; many of whom likewise perished by the inclemency of the season, and the humidity of the air and soil.

The invention of beachs

IN

m Grotius Hist. lib. i. Bentivoglio, and Meteren, anno

In consequence of the loss of men sustained at Book this siege and that of Bergen, the duke of Parma found his army exceedingly diminished. This confideration alone must have been a sensible mortifi- Anxiety of cation to a general of so great activity and enters the Duke of prize, but he was still more deeply mortified at Parma. the difficulty which he found in supporting the forces that still remained under his command. They had begun to murmur on account of the arrears which were due to them, and he dreaded the loss of that authority over them which he had hitherto maintained. He had earnestly solicited remittances from the court of Spain, and had represented the fatal consequences which must attend the irregular payment of his troops. But his requests had not for some time past been listened to as formerly, and some of the bills which he drew had been returned unpaid. This was owing partly to the low state of Philip's finances, which, great as his refources were, had been overburdened by the enormous expence in which his late armament had involved him; and partly to the malignity and envy of the Spanish ministers. The duke could not conceal his chagrin at the disappointment, which was greatly augmented by the decline of his health, and the fymptoms of a dropfy, which forme years afterwards put a period to his life.

In this situation he received greater satisfaction Generalesfrom an event which was one of the consequences trayed to of the intrigues of the earl of Leicester. The gar-the sparisons of several towns had, through the influence niards. of that nobleman's partizans, or from the deficiencies in their pay occasioned by his misconduct, shewn great contempt for the authority of the States and prince Maurice; but they had all been brought n Meteren, p. 503-

B o o k XXI.

278

brought back to their duty, except the garrison of St. Gertrudenburg, which consisted of one thoufand five hundred foot and three hundred horse, partly Dutch and partly English. This garrison having indulged themselves in greater excesses than any other, were conscious of such a degree of guilt as they thought could not easily be forgiven: they were therefore still as refractory and seditious as ever, maintaining openly, that they were accountable to none but the queen of England; and kizing upon ships, and carrying off plunder from the friends as well as the enemies of the confederacy. The States apprehensive of their delivering the town to the enemy, applied every foothing expedient to prevent them. They offered them 2 full pardon of their offences, got lord Willoughby to interpose his influence, and made immediate payment of a great proportion of their arrears; but all endeavours were ineffectual. In the mean time Lanzavecchia, the governor of Breda, being well informed of their temper and disposition, employed secret agents to confirm them in their sedirious purposes, holding forth to them the rewards which they might hope for from the duke of Parma, while there was nothing to be expected from the queen of England or the States, but either an ignominious punishment, or perpetual diffidence and contempt. They helitated for some time; but when an offer was made to them in the name of the duke of Parma of full payment of their arrears, besides a sum of money equal to five years pay, they were unable to relift the allurement; they agreed to give up the town on the terms propoled, and began to prepare for the execution of their defign, by disarming the inhabitants. Upon receiving intelligence of this infamous transaction, Maurice set out by sea with a body of troops, in order to reduce the garrison by force of arms. But before.

1589.

before he had time to make any progress in the Book siege, having been informed that the duke of Parma was upon his march to oppose him with a superior army, he thought it prudent to retire. The duke foon afterwards entered the town, and having fulfilled his engagements to the garrison, he bestowed the government upon Lanzavecchia, as a reward for the service he had performed. Gertrudenburg was the first town in Holland which the Spaniards had acquired fince their expulsion from that province about twelve years before; and it gave Farnele, on that account, the most fensible joy and fatisfaction. The States on the other hand expressed their indignation against the traitors, by profcribing them; and it ought not to be forgotten, that through various accidents almost all of them fell into the hands of the confederates, and had the fentence of proscription executed upon them with the utmost rigour.

FROM Gertrudenburg the Spanish army was fent under count Charles of Mansvelt, to reduce the towns of Heusden and Romersval, and the fort of Louvestein; but all their attempts on these places were baffled by the activity and vigour of prince Maurice and count Hohenloe.

THE duke of Parma returned to Bruffeis, and To work not long afterwards he set out for Germani, 10, 100 drink the waters at Spa, although it was be seven he would not have gone at this feature, which was the most proper for all military operators, if his army had been in a condition to the same same any enterprize worthy of his former fame? Darry absence, prince Maurice was barein able to prince ! count Mansvelt from making any new acronings, The forces of these two generals were nearly or. ... 20:5:08

· Gratien, p. 132.

Book neither party was inclined to risk an engagement, XXI. and no rencounter past between them that deserves to be recorded.

Atchierement: c: Scheck.

Some important fervices were in the mean time performed by the indefatigable Schenck in the interior provinces. Having forme time before the prefent period, proposed to the States to build a fort upon the Rhane, at the place where that river divides itself into two branches, and forms the ifle of Betuwe, the States approved highly of his proposal, and furnished him with every thing neceffary for carrying it into execution. He finished it with great dispatch, and having fixed there his head-quarters, he over-ran all the country round, and feized every favourable opportunity of annoying the enemy. He took the city of Bonne, upon the Rhine, by furprise in the night. Having been informed that a body of troops were upon their march to reinforce Verdugo, the governor of Groningen, and were escorting a sum of money to that place for the payment of the garrison, he chose his ground with fo much skill, and attacked them with fuch impetuofity and ardour, that routed them, and got possession of the money without the loss of a fingle man. But there was nothing on which he was fo intent as the recovery of Nimeguen, which some years before he himsel had conquered for the Spaniards. Nimeguen stands on the banks of the Waal, at the diftance of only a few hours sail from the fort which Schenck had constructed. Having embarked his troops, he fet out with an intention to reach the town about the middle of the night. Through some accident or mistake he did not arrive till the morning, when he happened unfortunately to land at a house where a number of persons were P Called anciently Batavia.

PHILIP IL KING OF SPAIN.

28_I were affembled for the celebration of a wed-Boom ding. By these persons the alarm was instantly given to the rest of the inhabitants, who were well acquainted with the enmity with which Schenck had for some time past been animated against them, and knew that an universal pillage would be the consequence of his success. They ran to arms from every quarter, and made a furious attack upon his men, and, notwithstanding the most intrepid refistance, drove them towards their boats in great confusion. Schenck endeavoured to rally them. but in vain. The town's people pursued, and slew many of them while they were attempting to efcape. Schenck himself was wounded, and im-Death of mediately afterwards his boat was overfet, and he, and all on board were drowned. Such was the

XXL 12894

No other material transaction occurred during Battle of this campaign but the fiege of Rhinberg, which Rhinberg. was undertaken at the carnest desire of the elector. of Cologn, and the charge of it committed by the duke of Parma to the marquis of Varambon. Colonel Vere, an English officer of high reputation, was sent by the States to the relief of the besieged, and between him and Varambon a bloody battle was fought, in which the English commander gained a complete victory. After this he entered the town, and fortified it so strongly, as enabled the inhabitants for some time longer to preserve their liberty and independence.

fate of this brave man at the age of forty, by whom, ever fince his revolt, the Spaniards had been subjected to perpetual apprehensions and alarms 9

IT was now the end of autumn, and the duke The dake of of Parma was returned from Spa. Soon after his turns from return, his apprehensions with regard to the con-Spasequences of the irregular payment of his troops. were were verified by the mutiny of a Spanish regiment which lay in garrison at Courtray. From complaints the soldiers proceeded to threats, and at last openly refused to obey his commands. With the utmost difficulty he raised money sufficient to appease them. But as this was the first sedition which had happened since the commencement of his government, he was the more sensibly afflicted by it, and dreaded, that the example which it afforded, would soon be followed by the garrisons

The furprife of Breda.

in other towns.

282

This event happened about the end of the year 1589; and in the month of February immediately following, another misfortune happened. which convinced the duke, that prince Maurice was an antagonist of a character extremely different from that of any other with whom he had hitherto contended. This was the loss of the important city of Breda, of which Maurice got pofsession by a singular stratagem, suggested to him by the master of a boat, called Adrian Vandenberg, who had sometimes supplied the town and garrison with turf for firing. When Lanzavecchia, the governor, was at Breda, all vessels which came there were carefully examined; but the duke of Parma, having rewarded this crafty Italian, for the part which he acted in corrupting the garrison of St. Gertrudenburg, with the government of that town, still suffered him to retain that of Breda. Lanzavecchia found it necessary to be often absent from the latter of these places; and, during his absence, usually committed the charge of it to his fon. Vandenberg having observed that on these occasions there was commonly great negligence in fearching his boat, founded upon this circumstance his plan for taking the citadel by furprise. It was communicated to prince Maurice, rice, who readily embraced it, and immediately Book applied himself to put it in execution. The boat was loaded in appearance with turf, as usual; but the turf was supported by a floor of planks fixed at the diffance of feveral feet from the bottom; and under this floor seventy select soldiers were placed, under the command of Charles Harauguer. an officer of diftinguished valour and capacity. They had but a few miles to fail; yet, through unexpected accidents, several days passed before they could reach Breda. The wind turned against them, the melting ice retarded their course, and the boat having struck upon a bank, was so much damaged, that the foldiers were for some time up to the knees in water. Their provisions were almost spent, and one of their number was seized with a violent cough, which, if it continued, they foresaw would certainly occasion a discovery. This man had the generolity to offer them his fword, and to entreat them to kill him. They as generoully declined it; and being resolved to run all risks, rather than embrue their hands in the blood of their companion, they still persisted in their defign. Happily their virtue was rewarded: the foldier's cough left him, and even the leak in their veffel was stopt by some accidental cause.

In order to secure the absence of Lanzavecchia. whose vigilance there was much ground to dread, prince Maurice had made a feint of marching against Gertrudenburg, and this artifice produced the defired effect. Lanzavecchia was absent from Breda when the boat arrived. It was admitted within the fortifications of the castle, and the fearch was made in the most superficial manner.

Nor-

A native of Cambray.

B o o x XXI. 1590.

284

NOTWITHSTANDING this, there was still the utmost danger of a discovery, and it would certainly have been made, had not Vandenberg polsessed an extraordinary share of address and art, which he exerted on this occasion. There being a scarcity of fuel in the castle, the turf was immediately purchased; the soldiers of the garrison were fet to work in carrying it ashore, and so great a number of hands were employed, that they would foon have uncovered the planks, and thereby have detected the plot, had not Vandenberg, pretending to be fatigued with labour and watching, and unable to affift the foldiers any longer in unloading, first amused them with discourse, and then invited them to join him in drinking some wine which he had provided. His offer was readily accepted. The night came on, and the Spanish soldiers were all either asleep or drunk. Vandenberg then set out, in order to give notice of his success to prince Maurice and count Hobenloe, who, according to agreement, had in great filence brought forward a body of forces within a little distance of the town.

About the middle of the night, Harauguer issued forth from his retreat; and having divided his band into two bodies, he attacked, at the same time, both the guards which were placed at the gate towards the country, and those which were stationed at another gate which led from the citadel to the town, and meeting with little resistance, he secured possession of the gates. Young Lanzavecchia rushed out against him with between thirty and forty of the garrison; but these men were not able to withstand the determined and desperate valour of the assainst. They were all either put to the sword or dispersed, and Lanzavecchia himself was wounded and taken prisoner,

THE

PHILIP IL KING OF SPAIN

The slarm was fore communicated to the Tier. in which there was a running gardin. wolffing of five companies of ha are four and me if there. The citizens offered to कान्यकार मार पार हारा हाता in defending the formantes. The rule of ardly garrifon, being fruit with an mornin me ic and having an community - दोर्स का देन्स their operations, fairery from the trong to the mean time prince Marice arrest in the one del, and the inhabiters, being and are an ger in to lepport them, fest a many water them turerder, on confine the they freid me be pundered. And to the tribe Marrie tally greed; but received that they found pay and rinery thousand firms to be comment times Lagoont &

Matrice received the greater initialized from this acquisition, which had been attended a six the less of only one man, as Recia had been for many years the hereditary property of his family; and for the same reason the citizens were the sea resident in submitting to his anticorty. He appointed the brave Harauguer to be governor of the lown, and liberally rewarded Vanoenberg, and all the other sailors and societies, in proportion to their nerit.

The duke of Parma, on the other hand, was extremely mortified with what had happened, and ighly incenfed against his countrymen the Italians, who had so basely deserted the town committed to heir care. He ordered the officers to be arrested, and afterwards commanded all of them to be excuted, agreeably to the sentence of a count-maral, except one, whom he pardoned in consideration of his youth.

OLD Lanzavecchia's imprudence in committing o important a charge to fo young a man as his fon.

6 Grotius. Bentivoglio.

1590.

Book son, was already severely punished by his son's imprisonment, and the loss of the government of Breda. He punished himself still farther, by refigning his government of Gertrudenburg. Such were the bitter fruits of that corruption for which this man had been so lately rewarded. According to the principles which warriors and politicians are ready to adopt, his conduct deserved the reward which was bestowed upon it; but to the friends of virtue it will give satisfaction to observe, that, in the course of providence, punishment is inflicted formetimes not upon the treacherous alone, but on those too by whom they are prompted, or encouraged in their treachery.

> MEANWHILE Farnese resolving to recover the town, if possible, before prince Maurice should have time to secure it, sent count Mansvelt against it with a part of the army. But Maurice had no sooner acquired possession of the place, than he furnished it with provisions sufficient for many months, and stationed a garrison in it consisting of one thousand two hundred foot and four hundred horse. Mansvelt did not therefore think it expedient to lay immediate siege to Breda; but in order to cut off the communication of the garrison with Holland, he attempted to reduce a strong fort in the mouth of the river Mark, which commanded the navigation of that river. From this attempt however he was obliged to delift, after having lost between fix and seven hundred men. He then built another fort at the mouth of the river, and began to make preparations for belieging the town itself. In order to divert him from the profecution of his design, prince Maurice marched with a body of about five thousand men towards Nimeguen, refolving to beliege that town in case Mansvelt did not relinquish his present enterprize.

FARNESE

FARNESE, sensible of the great importance of Book Nimeguen, sent orders to count Mansvelt to lead his army thither without delay. Maurice perceived then that it was impracticable for him to attempt the siege with any probability of success, and encamped his troops in the Betuwe, on the north side of the Waal, opposite to Nimeguen. Having fortified the banks of the river, to prevent count Mansvelt from transporting his forces, he built, in fight of the enemy, a strong fort, after_ wards called by the name of Knotzenburg, direct. ly opposite to the town; by which he not only deprived Nimeguen of all the advantages which it had hitherto derived from its situation; but, as the cannon of this fort could reach the town, the inhabitants were exposed to continual danger. After having finished this important work, he dug a navigable canal across the Betuwe, from the Rhine to the Waal. This wife expedient rendered the navigation of the confederates in those parts secure, by making it unnecessary for their ships to pass by Nimeguen; and it was of great advantage to all the country round, by lessening the violence of the inundations to which that part of the Netherlands is fornetimes liable. The States of Guelderland and Overyssel had a just sense of the benefits which they derived from his operations, and they testified their gratitude by electing him governor of these two provinces.

1 (00.

HISTORY

OF THE REIGN OF

PHILIP THE SECOND

KING OF SPAIN.

B O O K XXII.

PART I.

ROM the capacity and vigour which Maurice Book had already displayed, Philip might have per- XXII. ceived that he should probably find full employment in the Netherlands for all the forces which, Affairs of in the present state of his finances, he was able to France. support. And considering the unfortunate issue of his enterprize against Elizabeth, and how much the reputation of his arms and counsels had suffered from his long unsuccessful struggle with the inhabitants of the United Provinces, it might have been expected that he would have feen the abfurdity of that preposterous ambition which had led him to undertake new conquests before he had reduced his own dominions under obedience. It does not appear that he ever feriously entertained the thoughts of renewing his attempt against Eng-Vol. II.

 $\mathsf{Digitized}\,\mathsf{by}\,Google$

1590.

Book land; but having never relinquished his designs on France, he had maintained his connexions with the heads of the catholic league; and notwithflanding the difficulty which he found in paying his army in Flanders, he had from time to time supplied them with considerable sums of money.

The catholic league,

THESE factious leaders had now more occasion than ever for his affiftance. After the treaty mentioned above, which Philip concluded with the duke of Guile at Joinville in the year 1585, the flames of war between the catholics and protestants had been kindled afresh from one end of the kingdom to the other. Henry, well acquainted with the fecret intentions of Guife and his partizans, which were no less hostile to himself than to the Calvinifts, would gladly have employed all his power for their deftruction; but he foon perceived that he was unable to contend openly with so great a force as they had provided against him, and therefore disguising his resentment for the affront offered to his authority, he resolved to accede to the league, in hopes of acquiring the direction of it, by declaring himself its head and protector. In consequence of this resolution, great preparations were made for profecuting the war against the Calvinists, and three different armies were raised. One of these Henry commanded in person: another was sent under the duke de Joyeuse against the king of Navarre; and the third was led by the duke of Guile, to oppole a numerous army of Germans, who were upon their march to the affiftance of the Hugonots. Joyeuse lost both his army and his life in the battle of Coutras; but the duke of Guile, who made up for the small number of his troops by his superior conduct and intrepidity, proved victorious over the Germans, and thereby acquired an increase of popularity and fame, which gave him uncontroulable influence over almost all the catholics in the kingdom. Elated with his success, and conscious of his power, this ambitious leader could no longer delay the execution of his designs; but resolved, after deposing the king, and confining him to a cloister, to place the infirm and aged cardinal of Bourbon upon the throne; hoping to engross the whole administration, and to secure the succession to himself, in the event of the cardinal's demise. Henry beheld with much dread the precipice on which he stood; and in order to avoid it, had recourse to that detestable expedient, of which, in his youth, he had shewn his approbation, in the massacre of St. Bartholemew, by commanding both the duke of Guise, and his brother the cardinal, to be assassing the strength of the surface of St. Bartholemew, by commanding both the duke of Guise, and his brother the cardinal, to be assassing the surface of the surface of St. Bartholemew, by commanding both the duke of Guise, and his brother the cardinal, to be assassing the surface of the

This murder, which even Henry pretended to justify only by the plea of necessity, did not produce the effect which he expected. Instead of intimidating his enemies, it served to instance their minds with wrath and indignation. In Paris, where the spirit of the league had long raged with the utmost sury, the people broke his statues to pieces, the ecclesiastics declaimed against him in the bitterest and most abusive terms, and the Sorbonne declared him to have forfeited the crown. His subjects almost every where rose up in arms against him, and the duke of Mayenne, brother of the Guises, a prince of extraordinary prudence and capacity, was chosen commander in chief in his brother's room.

In this fituation Henry had no resource lest but in the king of Navarre, whom he had deceived and persecuted. But this generous and heroic prince readily forgot the injuries he had received from him, and made haste to march with a numerous army to his assistance. Thus powerfully supported, Henry became an overmatch for his enemies; and he would soon have compelled the U 2 city of Paris to surrender, when a period was put to his life by a fanatic monk, who being seduced by his superiors, burned with the desire of meriting Heaven, by embruing his hands in the blood of his lawful prince. Such was the unfortunate end of Henry III. the last of the race of Valois, which had reigned over France for almost three hundred years.

Book XXII.

1589-

Accession of Henry IV.

THE king of Navarre, the undoubted heir of the crown, and whom the deceased monarch had nominated his fuccessor, was immediately proclaimed king in the camp, by the name of Henry IV. a name which will be for ever respected, not by the French nation alone, but by every friend of mankind and of virtue. Brought up in the hardest school of adversity, patient, frugal, and laborious; brave and wife; fincere, humane, and generous; of the strictest integrity, and the most untainted honour; he had long commanded the admiration of his enemies, as well as of the impartial world. Never did any prince succeed to a throne, adorned with more splendid, more substantial, or more amiable accomplishments; yet so fierce was the spirit of religious bigotry with which his subjects were inflamed; so great their abhorrence of Calvinism; and such their dread, that Henry who was himself a Calvinist, although the most moderate of his sect, would in imitation of the queen of England, overturn the popilh religion, that many of the catholics instantly forfook his camp; nor would any of them have been perfuaded to remain with him, had he not given them ground to entertain hopes of his conversion.

In Paris he had a numerous Party who would willingly have recognifed his right, in case he would have agreed to embrace the popish faith. There were others who, under the pretence of religion, had no other end in view but to secure and perpetuate tuate that unbounded licence which they had Book long enjoyed, of perpetrating the most atrocious XX II. crimes; and there were many, who having been gained over by Spanish influence, had, in concert with Mendoza the Spanish ambassador, and Cajetan the pope's legate; a partizan of Spain, formed the defign of conferring the crown, either on Philip himself, or his daughter Isabella *.

1590.

THE duke of Mayenne, who had adopted his brother's plan in all its branches, hoped to make these parties subservient to his own elevation to the throne. This defign, however, he concealed with care; and that he might have leifure to prepare the means of putting it into execution, he prevailed on a great majority to concur in electing the cardinal of Bourbon king; to which measure likewife, Philip actuated by a fimilar intention, gave his consent.

HENRY in the mean time finding himself unable, from the great desertion of his forces, to maintain his present situation before Paris, retired into Normandy, to wait there, till fuccours, which he expected from Elizabeth, should arrive Mayenne putting himself at the head of an army much more numerous than that of the king, pursued and attacked him in his fortifications near the town of Arques; but having been repulsed with great flaughter, and having fuffered afterwards a total overthrow in the battle of Ivry, in which, as on many other occasions, Henry's superior bravery supplied his want of numbers, Mayenne was obliged, with the shattered remains of his army, to take refuge in the metropolis. There he stayed no longer than till he had consulted with the duke of Nemours, the governor, with regard to the proper measures of defence, in case the city should be belieged by the victorious army; after which he fet

Grand-daughter of Henry II.

XXII. 1590.

294

Book set out for Picardy, to meet the duke of Parma. from whom he expected a reinforcemet of troops. The king arrived foon after in the neighbourhood Siege of Pa- of Paris, and having made himself master of the course of the Seyne, and the Marne, and blocked up every entry by which provisions might be conveyed into the town, he invested it on every side, and foon reduced the inhabitants to extreme necessity.

> By the persuasion however of their leaders, seconded by the Spanish minister and the pope's legate; by the decrees of the Sorbonne, and the harangues of the clergy; they were confirmed in the resolution which they had formed from the beginning, to endure every calamity, rather than receive an heretical king, whose authority they were taught to believe they could not acknowledge, without endangering their falvation.

Philip's views on France.

In their present distressful situation they had no prospect of relief, but from the arms of Spain; nor was Philip less inclined now to interpose in their behalf, and that of the league in general, than The affairs of France were at this time the principal object of his attention; and he would gladly have exerted himself against the king with his utmost vigour, especially as the cardinal of Bourbon was lately dead, if the present juncture had been favourable to his ambitious design, of seizing the monarchy for himself, or his daughter; by which, more than by zeal for the catholic faith, he had long been actuated. But having penetrated into the views of Mayenne, and found that from him and all his party he had reason to expect the most strenuous opposition; he considered, that if Henry were utterly subdued, the catholics, standing then no longer in need of his assistance, would probably unite against him, and without regard to the obligations which he had laid them under, render all his expence and labour fruitless.

fruitless. He resolved therefore, agreeably to the Book advice of the duke of Parma, to protract the war, and to afford the league only fuch affiftance as might prevent the king from acquiring an entire ascendant over them; hoping thereby to waste the strength of both the contending parties, and sooner or later to oblige them to comply with whatever terms he should be pleased to prescribe.

1590.

CONFORMABLY to this plan, the duke of Parma, with whom Mayenne had an interview at Condé, gave him only two thousand seven hundred foot and eight hundred horse. But as this reinforcement was inadequate to the purpose for which it had been solicited, Philip became apprehensive that the resolution of the besieged might fail; and dreaded, that if Henry were once master of the capital, a prince of fo great ability and address might foon compel the rest of the kingdom to submit to his authority. To prevent this, he resolved to postpone every consideration of prudence and interest to the raising of the siege; and sent positive orders to the duke of Parma, to conduct his army to France for this purpose, with the utmost expedition. Farnese, though possessed of capacity and courage equal to the most difficult and dangerous enterprise, would gladly have diverted Philip from his design. He represented to him the dangerous consequences with which the absence of his troops from the Netherlands would be attended; and he attempted to make him fensible of the extreme uncertainty of those advantages which he expected to derive from taking so deep an interest in the affairs of France. But Philip blinded by his ambition, could not relinquish those delusive hopes which he had long fondly indulged, of adding France to his other dominions. He was deaf to the duke's prudent remonstrances, and only listened to his advice, so far as to consent that he might return return to the Low Countries, when the fiege of Book XXII. Paris should be raised.

FINDING the king thus obstinate and inflexible. 1590. The duke of Farnese committed the government, during his expedition into France.

absence, to count Peter Ernest of Mansvelt, and appointed his fon count Charles to command the small number of troops, which he designed to leave behind him for the defence of the Netherlands. He then applied with great anxiety to make the necessary preparations for his march. was well aware of the difficulty which he must encounter in his intended enterprize against a prince of so great abilities as the king of France, in the midst of his dominions, and at the head of a victorious army, commanded by a gallant and almost invincible nobility. This confideration however. far from intimidating him, served only to make him exert with more than ordinary vigour, those illustrious talents with which he was endowed; left now, when he was about to enter the lists with so great a rival for military fame, he should forfeit that high renown which his former atchievements had procured him.

Comparison of him with Henry.

HENRY was at this time about forty years of age, and Farnele a few years older. From their earliest youth they had been alike distinguished by the love of arms; and had past their lives either in learning, or in practifing the art of war. They possessed alike the talent of conciliating the affections of their troops, without any relaxation of difcipline, or diminution of authority. They were equal too in personal courage, in quick discernment. and in fertility of genius. But the king was more prompt in his decisions; the duke more cautious and circumspect. The latter always cool, and master of himself, transgressed on no occasion the bounds of the strictest prudence; but the former was

was often betrayed by his natural impetuofity and Book ardour, rather to act the part of a common foldier. XXII. than of a general, and unnecessarily to expose his person to danger. From the same impetuosity of temper, the king was ever fond of striking a decifive blow, by a pitched battle in the field; whereas the duke chose rather to accomplish his designs by stratagem and dexterity, without bloodshed. Notwithstanding this diversity in their characters, they were indisputably the greatest captains of the age in which they lived, and may be compared, without suffering by the comparison, with the most illustrious commanders either in ancient or in modern times.

FARNESE was ready to set out from Brussels in His wife the beginning of August, with an army of four-precautions. teen thousand foot and three thousand horse. On his arrival in France, having convened his principal officers together, he explained to them the conduct proper to be observed in the present expedition; and represented the necessity of requiring a strict attention from every individual in the army. to all the rules of military discipline. They were about to enter into a kingdom, where the people being naturally jealous of the Spaniards, suspicions would be eafily excited, that instead of having come to their assistance, he intended to reduce them under the government of Spain. Against giving ground for these suspicions, which might defeat the intentions of the king, they must be continually on their guard, and take effectual care to restrain the troops from offering any violence to the natives. They were ere long to pursue their march in the face of a bold and enterprizing enemy; and for this reason it would be necessary that the most perfect order should be observed, that no tumult should be permitted in their quarters, and no soldier allowed to leave his colours night or day, upop

Digitized by Google

1590.

BOOK upon any pretence whatever; that the country should be reconnoitred with the utmost care; that they should take up their quarters every evening a considerable time before sun-set; that the troops should stand under their arms, till the intrenchments were completed; and that their intrenchments should be as strongly fortified, as if the enemy were in fight.

> THE duke secured the execution of these orders. by the activity and vigilance which he exerted. Although he had many officers of high reputation under him, yet he resolved not to put implicit trust in any of them. From charts or maps, joined to the information which he received from the natives, he had acquired a thorough knowledge of the country through which he was to pass. He heard in perfon the reports of all the parties which he fent to reconnoitre; marked out the encampments with his own hand, and bestowed such particular attention on every thing which he deemed of the least importance, that he left himself no other time for repose, but the few hours between beating the reveille, and the marching of the troops.

> In order to preserve his men fresh and vigorous for the time of action, he marched gently forwards; and did not arrive at Meaux, which is ten leagues distant from Paris, till the 23d of August. He was joined at Meaux by the duke de Mayenne, with ten thousand foot and one thoufand five hundred horse; and from this place he fent intelligence to the befieged, that he hoped to be able in a few days to relieve them.

Bistress of the Parisi-

THEIR patience was almost exhausted. had been for many days reduced to the most deplorable condition. Great numbers had died of want, or of diseases occasioned by the unwholefome food to which they had been obliged to have recourse:

recourse; and though their bigotry made them Book still entertain the thoughts of a surrender with horror, it had required the utmost vigilance on the part of the governor, to prevent it from taking place. They believed it to be impossible for them to hold out even for the few days, at the end of which the duke of Parma had given them hopes of of his arrival. Of this desperate situation, their leaders did not fail to inform him; nor did he delay advancing towards them one moment longer than was necessary in order to secure a fortunate issue to his enterprize.

1590.

HENRY had for several weeks entertained the Henry raises most sanguine hopes of being able to terminate the the slege. fiege before the duke could arrive b. He was now extremely chagrined and mortified, and was at the same time thrown into great perplexity, with respect to the measures proper to be pursued. Unwilling to quit his prize, when he was upon the point of feizing it, he would gladly have divided his army, and leaving a part of it to continue the blockade, have led the rest to meet the enemy. But as it had lately suffered great diminution by fickness, he apprehended that he would find sufficient employment for the whole, in defending himself against the Spaniards. After much hesitation he raised the siege, and set out to oppose the duke of Parma, before he should approach nearer the town c.

HAVING advanced as far as Chelles (which lies about four leagues distant from Paris) he pitched his camp in a spacious plain, which is terminated by two hills of a gentle ascent, separated from each other by the road that leads to Meaux. The duke of Parma's army was encamped on the other fide of these hills, and was well secured by strong intrench-

It had lasted four months.

[·] His army amounted to twenty thousand foot and five thousand horse.

1590.

Book intrenchments. In this fituation the two armies remained for several days. The duke did not now lie under the same necessity as before, of precipitating his approach to Paris, because the citizens having ventured, after the king's departure, to make excursions into the country, had furnished themselves with some provisions from the places adjacent; and the king durst not attack such strong intrenchments, defended by an army superior in number to his own. But being eager to engage, and dreading the daily diminution of his forces from the sickness which prevailed among them, Henry sent a defiance to the duke of Mayenne, calling upon him to quit his den, in which he lay more like a fox than a lion, that the contest between them might be decided, and an end put to the calamities of the kingdom.

Stratagem of the duke of Parma.

MAYENNE sent the herald who brought this challenge to the duke of Parma, who answered fmiling, that his present conduct he perceived, was not agreeable to the king; but that he had been accustomed to fight, only when he himself thought proper, and not when it was convenient for his enemies; and he added, that far from declining battle, he would offer it as foon as the interest of the cause which he had come to support, should render it expedient. Agreeably to the spirit of this reply, Farnese kept his army within their lines for two days longer; during which time he was employed in examining the fituation of the country, and in considering how he might accomplish the end of his expedition, without hazarding an engagement. Having at length fixed his plan of operations, without communicating it to the duke de Mayenne, or any other of his officers, he gave out, that he now intended to offer battle. Of the van, which confifted of two foundrons of lances. with all the light horse in his army, he gave the command command to the marguis De Renti, with instruc- Book tions, that as foon as he should reach the top of the interjacent hill, he should spread out his troops, and make as large a front as possible; and then begin to descend slowly towards the enemy, but not to engage without further orders, whatever provocation should be given him. He committed the charge of the main army to the duke de Mayenne, and that of the rear to the Sieur de la Mothe; while he reserved liberty to himself, to ride from one part of the army to the other, as occasion should require.

PHILIP II. KING OF SPAIN.

301 XXII. 1590.

WHEN the king was informed of this disposition and movement of the Spanish army, he could not doubt that the duke had at length resolved to try the fortune of a battle. His eyes sparkled with joy. He drew up his army in battle array, with the utmost celerity and skill; but resolved to wait till the enemy should descend to the plain, where he might enter the lists with them on equal terms.

WHEN the van of the Spanish army had formed so large a front, as totally obstructed the view of every thing behind them, the duke commanded De Renti to stop, and to wait for the king, in case he should think fit to ascend the hill. Then clapping spurs to his horse, he galloped back to the duke de Mayenne, who was advancing with the main army, and taking him by the hand, he faid with a cheerful animated countenance. will foon be delivered now, my lord; but for this purpose we must turn back, and direct our march to another quarter." He then defired both Mayenne and La Mothe to march towards Lagny, a town on the other side of the Marne, and instructed them to take possession of the ground on this side, directly opposite to the town, and to employ all their

HISTORY OF THE REIGN OF

Book their troops in drawing strong lines of circumval-XXII. lation round their camp.

1590.

302

THESE orders were executed with great expedition. A battery of the largest cannon was planted over against the town; and the camp was fortised in such a manner with trenches, breast-works, and redoubts, as to render it impregnable.

When this was done, the marquis De Renti, who for several hours had amused the enemy with hopes that he intended to come down from the hill, began to file off towards Lagny; after having planted a body of select troops, under an officer of the name of Basta, in certain woody parts of the hill, to secure his retreat.

THE king in the mean time knew nothing of what had passed on the other side of the hill; and when he saw the marquis De Renti depart, he fent a detachment after him to attack his rear, and if possible to discover the duke's design. But this detachment fell unexpectedly among the Spanish troops under Basta; and a furious rencounter enfued, which continued with various success till night, when both parties retired to their respective camps. The king remained all night entirely ignorant of the operations of the enemy. He could not suppose that Farnese, a general so distinguished for his caution, would attempt to transport his forces over the Marne, in order to advance to Paris, on the other side of that river, while so strong a fortified pass as Lagny lay behind him. And it was still more difficult to believe, that in the face of such an army as lay ready to attack him, he would undertake the fiege of Legny; especially as the river lay between him and that place. It was the last of these measures however, on which the duke of Parma had resolved; and all his movements poveness on the day before his been made in order to entire facesia. Next morning the kind received intelligence of his delign, but he had the mortification to perceive that it was beyond his power to person him from carrying it man extration. On each hand be and purpleted with infermountable difficulties. The fortifications of the panils many were already to complete, that he could not smack them with the immedi hopes of foccess. If he found remain where he was, Lagmy would certainly be left, and thereby a pullage to Paris operad to the other fide of the river ; and of he thould transport his many, in order to five Lagray, the duke would then be at liberty to much directly by the road on this lide to the relief of the belieged.

PHILIP E KING OF SPAIN

THERE was no other expedient in his power, but, while he remained in his prefent fituation, to fend reinforcements from time to time to the gamfon of Lagny.

The duke of Parma mean while pushed for the tabu ward the fiege of that place with the utmost celerity and vigour, having, as already mentioned, planted a battery on this fide of the river, he opened it next marning, and foon laid a great part of the wall in ruins. The garrifon however still believed themselves to be sourc, as the river was between them and the enemy; but the duke had thrown a bridge of boats over it form miles above the town, and had already transported several thousands of his bravelt troops. These troops were ready to mount the breach as foon as it was made practicable. the first affault they were repulled with great bravery by the garrison, but an error in military discipline, committed by La-fin, the governor, quickly decided the fate of Lagny, Instead of relieving those who had fultained the first assault, by changing them file by file, according to an established rule in the defence

HISTORY OF THE REIGN OF

XXII. 1590.

304

Book defence of places, he attempted to do it all at once, and thereby threw his men into confusion. This blunder was perceived by the affailants, who returned instantly to the charge with redoubled fury, and after taking La-fin himself prisoner, put most of the garrison to the sword, while the king stood a forrowful spectator of the loss of the place. and the flaughter of his men.

Relief of Paris.

AFTER the taking of Lagny, no other obstacle remained to prevent the Spaniards from approaching Paris on that side of the river, but the garnifons at the bridges of St. Maur and Charenton. These were easily overcome, and the convoys with provisions advanced without molestation to the gates of the city. The joy of the Parisians on this occasion may be more easily imagined than described; they poured forth in multitudes to receive that food of which they stood so much in need, and every tongue celebrated in the highest strains the praises of their deliverer.

Error of the French momarch.

No person admired more that dexterity by which the duke of Parma had accomplished his design, than the king himself; but his generous spirit was severely mortified, and he had the greater reason for the chagrin which he felt on this occasion; because, if, instead of encamping his army at Chelles, he had followed the counsel of the wise La Noue, and advanced as far as Claye, Lagny might have been faved, and the Spanish army so long retarded, that the Parisians must have thrown themselves upon his mercy.

HENRY's uneafiness was greatly augmented when he considered, that at present it was impossible for him by any bold decifive stroke to retrieve his error. He knew it to be vain to entertain the hopes of forcing the duke of Parma, now when the end of his expedition was accomplished, to expose his troops troops to the risk of a battle. His own army was Book greatly weakened by fickness, and the fatigues of a XXII. long campaign. All the country round being laid waste, he began to feel a scarcity of provisions: his exchequer was exhausted, and many of his nobility and gentry, who served at their own expence, having no farther expectations this season of either subduing Paris, or compelling the enemy to engage, were impatient to depart. Determined by these motives, he retired to St. Dennis, and having disbanded the greatest part of his for- He disbands ces, he sent the nobility to provide for the security his semy. of the several provinces in which their interest lay, retaining only a flying army of his best troops. with which he intended during the winter to check the progress of the enemy.

1590.

This little army was not fo formidable as to siege of prevent the duke of Parma from undertaking Corbeil. whatever enterprize he should incline. At the defire of Mayenne, and the other heads of the league, he laid siege to Corbeil; and notwithstanding the most obstinate resistance, he took it by assault, but not till he had spent many days in the siege. and lost a great number of men.

Being desirous to preserve in his own hands an acquisition which had cost him so dear, he proposed to the leaders of the league to put in Corbeil a garrison of his Walloon or Italian forces. proposal perhaps he meant only to make trial of their disposition towards the catholic king; or, confidering how averse he himself had ever been from his present expedition, he intended to make Philip sensible of the difficulty of deriving any substantial advantage from taking so deep an interest in the affairs of France.

WHATEVER was his motive, Mayenne, and the other leaders, declined confenting to his propofal, and in their refusal gave him a clear discovery Vol. II. of

306 B o o k XXII. 1590.

of their jealousy and suspicion. This discovery confirmed him in his opinion, that matters were far from being ripe for the execution of Philip's designs, and that probably he should never be able to accomplish them by any other means than by protracting the war, till the strength and patience of the contending parties were exhausted. plan had, as mentioned above, been recommended to Philip by the duke himself; and conformably to it, he resolved, since neither party was in immediate danger of being overpowered, to return to the Netherlands. Other motives concurred in determining him to form this resolution; the inclemency of the season, the sickliness of his army, the want of money, and a scarcity of provifions; which last was so great, as made it necessary for him sometimes to suffer his troops to plunder the inhabitants, although he foresaw that his granting this permission must not only prove prejudicial to his discipline, but contribute likewise to alienate the affections of the people, and thereby to obstruct his master's views.

The catholic leaders, who had expected that he would have remained in France till the king was totally subdued, laboured with much importunity to divert him from his purpose; but all their arguments were ineffectual. The state of affairs in the Netherlands, he informed them, rendered his return indispensably necessary, but he would send them money, and leave such a number of troops as would enable them to prosecute the war. Neither the money of nor troops which he promised were answerable to the sanguine expectations which they had formed. They saw that Philip, notwithstanding the seeming zeal with which he had espoused

d Thirty thousand ducats.

e Between five and fix thousand.

PHILIP II. KING OF SPAIN.

307 XXII. 1590,

espoused their cause, was surely actuated by some Book private motive of ambition; that there was nothing farther from his intention than to bring the war to a conclusion, and that he would never contribute effectually to their gaining a victory over their enemies, unless he himself were to reap the fruits of it. They found it necessary however to conceal their suspicions, and to accept of the scanty supply of money and troops which the duke had offered. Farnese in the mean time was preparing for his march; and, as he could not doubt that Henry would give him all the annoyance in his power, he employed the same precautions as he had done formerly when he left the Netherlands. Having drawn up his army in four divisions, he marched always in the order of battle: the country through which he passed was diligently reconnoitred by the light horse, and his camp was every evening secured by strong intrenchments.

NOTWITHSTANDING these precautions, the The duke king was determined not to fuffer him to return un-returns to molested. With this intention he had brought a lands. felect body of troops to Compeigne, near the borders of Picardy, and he set out with them from that place, as foon as he got information of the enemy's route, inflamed with the defire of taking vengeance for the injuries he had received. Henry had full scope in the present scene of action for his wonted bravery and vigilance, nor did he suffer any opportunity to escape of exerting these qualities with fignal damage to the enemy. ing perpetually round them, he attacked them fometimes in the front, when they least expected it, fometimes in the flank, and fometimes in the rear, giving them no respite night or day, and filling their minds with continual apprehensions and alarms.

No

HISTORY OF THE REIGN OF Book XXII.

308

No general could have made greater efforts with so small a force; and if the Spaniards had been commanded by a general less distinguished than the duke of Parma for prudence and circumspection, it is impossible, considering the length of their march, the badness of the roads, and the feason of the year, but they must have been often thrown into confusion, and the greater part of them destroyed. But the duke's vigilance was not inferior to the activity of the king; while he was perpetually on his guard, and ever ready to affift whatever part of his army was attacked, he fuffered no provocation to divert him from the profecution of his march; and at last he brought his troops, though not without considerable loss, yet in good order, into the province of Hainault.

PA'RTII.

Affairs of the Low Countries THE duke of Parma, on his return to the Netherlands, found that all the unhappy confequences which he foretold had arisen from his absence. Having drained his finances by the French expedition, many of the troops left in the Low Countries had mutinied on account of their want of pay. The forces of the confederated states had over-run the fertile provinces of Brabant and Flanders; and prince Maurice having made himself master of a great number of the smaller towns upon the frontier, had paved the way for future conquests.

These misfortunes gave the duke of Parma the greater uneafiness, as he had little prospect of being able soon either to retrieve his losses, or to make f D' Avila, lib. xi. Bentivoglio, part ii. lib. v. Thuanus, lib. xcix. fect. vi. and vii.

PHILIP II. KING OF SPAIN

Book XXII. 1591.

309

make reprifals on the enemy. Finding by his instructions from the court of Spain, that Philip was as much intoxicated as ever with his ambitious views on France, he was obliged to station the greatest part of his troops in the province of Artois and Hainault, where they might be ready to march. if necessary, to the assistance of the league. And thus several of the most important towns, which lay next to the revolted provinces, being badly furnished with garrisons to defend them, were exposed an easy prey to the enemy. The confederates were too fagacious not to discern the advantage which was thus presented to them: whereas they had, till lately, been satisfied with defending their frontier, which they had done with much anxiety, and often without success; they now took courage from the distractions in which Philip's preposterous ambition had involved him, and refolved to exert themselves with vigour in carrying on an offensive War.

THE year 1591 had just begun, when colonel Prince Mau-Norris led out the garrison of Ostend, which had rice subdues. been reinforced by troops from England; and having taken the fort of Blakemberg, between Oftend and Sluys, he laid a great part of Flanders open to his incursions. Soon afterwards another party of the forces of the States surprised the forts of Turnhout and Westerlo, in Brabant. But these conquests were inconsiderable when compared with those of prince Maurice, who having put his troops in motion, as early as the season would permit, opened the campaign with the fiege of Zutphen, zutphen, and foon compelled the garrison to surrender.

FROM this place he led his army against Deven-and Deventer, a town of still greater importance than Zut-ter. phen. Deventer had been, as above related, betrayed to the Spaniards by Sir William Stanly; and and Maurice was earnestly solicited to undertake the fiege of it, at this time, by colonel Vere, who was fired with the generous ambition of wiping out the reproach which Stanly's treachery had brought upon his countrymen. Vere displayed in this siege all that bravery and conduct, for which he is fo highly celebrated by the cotemporary historians; and next to Maurice, who conducted the attack with consummate prudence, he principally contributed to the reduction of the place. It was vigorously defended by the count de Berg, cousin-german to the prince; but the count being grievously wounded, and the wall on that fide where Vere commanded laid in ruins, the garrison capitulated in a few days after opening the trenches, and the inhabitants returned under obedience to the States .

310

Book XXII.

roth June.

The duke of Parma in the mean time laid siege to the fort of Knotzenberg, which Maurice had built in the end of the preceding year. By this fort, the confederates commanded the navigation of the river, and gave such annoyance to Nimeguen, as made the duke extremely uneasy about the fate of that important city. In order to conceal his design, he directed his march first towards the fort of Schenck. But Maurice was not deceived by this feint, and had taken care to strengthen the garrison of Knotzenberg with an addition of some chosen troops.

He defeats the Spanish horse. THE duke therefore met with the most vigorous resistance, and lost a great number of his men; still, however, he persisted in the siege. Maurice, dreading his success, relinquished a scheme which he had formed for the reduction of Groningen, and having passed the Waal, he pitched his camp within sight of the enemy. As he did not possess fufficient force to attack their lines, he mention 3 1 1 8 only to encourage the garrain by his presence. 3.4. or to straiten the duke's character and an arrange his convoys. Many form the refer was removed fuccess, till Maurice at length forme at opportunity of putting in practice the fallow me firewest: Having planted an amount of his worse trucks he marched up to the enem's care. are design count Solmes and enjoyed Vers. at the tend of fome companies of horie. The disce is a proumspect and cautious on this occasion than a tail fent out ten companies of Spanish and its ar hook to attack him. A ferce renormant entired, Agreeably to orders, the prince's troops from turned their backs and fled. The rows its punced with ardour, till they had passed a narrow defile and a bridge, when Mannee returning fuddenly to the charge, and the foldiers in amouth pouring in upon them from both fides, their return to the camp was intercepted, and almost all of them were put to the fword or taken prifocers.

E Vide Bentivoglio, p. 350. Grotius, p. 145. Meteren, p. 530.

This difaster afflicted the duke of Parma in the most sensible manner; a great number of the officers who fell were his countrymen, many of whom were persons of rank, in whose fortune he was particularly interested. He perceived that, if he remained in his present situation, he must find it extremely difficult, from the diminution of his cavalry, to supply his army with provisions, and he had not as yet made any confiderable progreis in the slege.

HE would still however have prosecuted his enterprize, if he had not been obliged to defift from it by orders which he received from Philip, to act only on the defensive in the Netherlands, and to spare his troops as much as possible for another expedition

HISTORY OF THE REIGN OF

Book XXII.

1591.

pedition into France. Maurice hoped to have gained some advantage over Farnese in his retreat from Knotzenberg; but both in this, and in his passage over the Waal, such wise precautions were employed, as rendered it impossible for the prince to annoy him; while they filled that young hero with the highest admiration of the duke of Parma's skill, and furnished him with important lessons in the military art, which he put in practice on many occasions afterwards with signal glory and success.

The reduction of Hulft,

HAVING passed the river, and put his troops in safety, the duke ordered new levies to be made in Germany, Burgundy, and the fouthern provinces of the Netherlands; after which, he went, on account of his indisposition, to drink the waters at Spa. He had no sooner set out, than prince Maurice having embarked four thousand foot and fix hundred horse, made a sudden descent on that part of Flanders called the county of Waes, and invested the town of Hulft. Mondragone, the governor of Antwerp, loft no time in drawing together such forces as were stationed in the neighbouring places, with an intention to raise the siege. But Maurice having pierced the dykes, had laid the country under water, and rendered it impoffible for Mondragone to approach. Agreeably to the intelligence which had induced the prince to engage in his present enterprize, the garrison of Hulst was weak, and they were badly furnished both with provisions and military stores. Their defence therefore was spiritless and feeble, and they soon agreed to a furrender.

and Nimeguen, From Hulft, Maurice returned unexpectedly to Knotzenberg; and as there was no Spanish army near, he threw a bridge over the Waal, and laid fiege to Nimeguen. The garrison, consisting of Germans and Walloons, made several fallies to retard his approach:

PHILIP II. KING OF SPAIN.

313 XXII. 1591.

approach; and, if they had been seconded by the Book townsmen, the reduction of a place of so great extent and strength as Nimeguen, must have detained But he had for some time past held a fecret correspondence with some of the principal inhabitants, and the people in general were extremely disaffected to the Spanish government. They took courage now, when Maurice was at hand to support them, and having rifen tumultuously, required the garrison, in the most peremptory manner, to put an end to their calamities by a furrender of the town. The garrison, conscious of their inability to relift both the citizens and the enemy, complied with their request; and Maurice was received by them rather as their deliver from flavery. than as a conqueror by whose arms they had been fubdued. They were admitted to the same privileges as the other towns of the confederacy; and although the administration was put into the hands of the protestants, yet no punishment was inflicted on any of the catholics, by whom the city had been kept so long under the Spanish government.

AFTER this important acquisition, Maurice set out for the Hague, and received there the most flattering testimonies of gratitude, attachment, and The prudence with which his enterprizes had been concerted, and the celerity and vigour with which he had carried them into execution, filled all Europe with his renown, and gave his countrymen the most sanguine hopes of future prosperity and success.

THEIR condition was extremely different at this state of the period from what it had ever been fince the confe-confederacy. deracy had been formed: till lately they had experienced an uninterrupted course of calamities; they had been perpetually disturbed with intestine broils, 1501.

Book and had lived under continual anxiety, occasioned partly by the neighbourhood of their active enterprifing enemy, and partly by the perfidious designs of those whom they had intrusted with the reigns of government. But their domestic dissensions were now composed; the enemy was removed to a greater distance, and their frontier was formed either by towns strongly fortified, or by navigable rivers, in which they could avail themselves of the superiority of their naval force. They were no longer disquieted by suspicions of the fidelity of their governors, and the loss which they had fuffered by the death of the prince of Orange, was compenfated by the extraordinary merit of his son.

French af-

Bur there was nothing which contributed fo much to inspire them with their present hopes, as their knowledge of Philip's attention being still as much engroffed as ever with the affairs of France. In profecution of his plan for acquiring the fovereignty of that kingdom, by fomenting the war, he had, after the duke of Parma raised the siege of Paris, afforded the leaders of the league only fuch affiftance as was necessary to save them from being overwhelmed. Their power was at this time exceedingly reduced, while that of the king had received a proportional augmentation. By his bravery and good conduct, joined to his clemency and moderation, Henry had allured great numbers of his rebellious subjects to their duty; and had, at the same time, engaged the protestants in Germany, and the queen of England, to interest themfelves more deeply than ever in his cause. veral months past he had been absolute master of the field, and he had lately begun the fiege of Rouen, with an army amounting nearly to thirty thousand horse and foot. Both the town and garrison were commanded by the Sieur de Villars, who displayed the highest degree of intrepidity, vigilance, and skill in the defence. But there was little little probability of his being able to defend it long Book against so powerful an army, whose operations XXII. were conducted by so great a master in the art of war.

THE duke de Mayenne, and other catholic lead- Siege of ers, dreaded, that the reduction of so important a Rouen. place as Rouen would prove fatal to their party, and they had exerted themselves strenuously to relieve it; but having no army, with which they could venture to enter the lifts with the king, they had recourse as formerly to Philip, and spared no pains to convince him, that, if he did not speedily interpose, Rouen, and all the other towns in their possession must, ere long submit to the king's victorious arms. They were seconded in their application by the Spanish ministers in France; and in consequence of instructions sent from Madrid to the duke of Parma, that general, after his return from Spa, had been entirely occupied in preparing to lead his army a second time to the assistance of the league.

His preparations were finished about the middle Duke of of December, and on the 21st of that month be-Parma's segan his march, taking the same precautions as in dition into his former expedition. He was joined by the duke France. de Mayenne in the Province of Picardy, and his army, after the reinforcement brought him by the duke, amounted to five and twenty thousand foot and fix thousand horse.

As in order to preserve his troops fresh and vigorous, he marched only a few miles each day. it was near the end of January before he reached the province of Normandy. At that time the fiege of Rouen was far advanced, and the garrison was reduced to the last extremity. When the king therefore heard of the duke of Parma's approach, he could not resolve to relinquish his enterprise;

HISTORY OF THE REIGN OF

Book but he left his infantry to profecute the fiege, and advanced towards the duke with his cavalry, in hopes that, by harassing and retarding him on his march, the garrison would be obliged to capitulate before he could arrive.

Danger of Henry at Aumaic.

316

By his vigilance, intrepidity and quick discernment, Henry was admirably fitted for the bold and dangerous enterprise in which he was now engaged; but his impetuous courage was not always under the government of prudence, and betrayed him fometimes into rash and desperate attempts. more becoming an officer of inferior rank, than a general or a king. Of this he gave a striking proof in his conduct on the present occasion. Having advanced before the rest of the cavalry with three or four hundred horse, he met unexpectedly, near the town of Aumale, with the forerunners of the duke of Parma's army, and he repulsed them with little difficulty; but although the whole Spanish army was in fight, he would not retire till he had taken a view of the order of their march, nor even after he faw the duke's light horse advancing towards him. With these likewise he encountered, and fought long and desperately, till many of his troops had fallen by his fide, and he himself was wounded. Had not the duke of Parma suspected an ambuscade, he might easily have cut off the king's retreat. He was urged by Mayenne to fend forward more troops for that purpole; but he refused to comply with the duke's request; and when he was afterwards reminded of the opportunity which he had loft, he replied, that he could not reproach himself for his conduct, as he sup-Posed that, in the king of Navarre, he had a great general to contend with, and not merely the captain of a troop of horse.

Henry was no fooner able, after his wound, to get on horseback, than he resumed his first defign of annoying the enemy on their march; and this he did with more circumspection than before, but but with such indefatigable vigour and activity, as Book kept the duke of Parma in perpetual alarms. Several warm rencounters passed, in which the success was various. The duke's vigilance, and the perfect discipline which he maintained, preserved his army from sustaining any great calamity. His march however was confiderably retarded, and there was much reason to apprehend, that the befieged would be compelled to furrender before he could advance to their relief.

XXII. 1591.

NOTHING less than the intrepidity and skill of Spirited con-Villars could have protracted the fiege to fo great lars. a length. This brave man, far from having any thoughts of capitulating, aspired to the glory of raising the siege without the affistance of the Spaniards. With this view he resolved to take advantage of the absence of the king, and to exert at once his whole force in an attack on the beliegers. Never was attack conducted with more intrepidity and vigour. Great numbers of the royalists were put to the fword; the marshal de Biron, their commander in chief, was wounded; their trenches were filled up; many of their cannon were spiked, or buried in the ditch; and their stores of provision and ammunition were either carried into the town or destroyed. Villars was at last repulsed, and obliged to retire within the walls; but not till the enemy had fuffered fo much loss by the flaughter which he committed, and the destruction of their works and stores, that he expected to be able to defend the town for several months longer, if his garrison were reinforced.

Or this happy change in his fituation, Villars gave immediate notice to the duke of Parma, and advised him to turn his arms to some other quarter, where they might be employed with greater advantage to the common cause. It was suspected, that vanity had confiderable influence in prompting

HISTORY OF THE REIGN OF 318

XXII. 1591.

Book Villars to give this advice. The duke was within two days march of Rouen when he received it, and he immediately called a council of war to confider of what was proper to be done.

> He was himself of opinion, that he ought still to pursue his march, in order to attack the enemy before they had recovered from their confusion; and he observed, that if he should only send a reinforcement to the garrison, as the governor had defired, the king of Navarre would instantly renew the operations of the fiege, and probably exert himself with greater vigour than before. the duke de Mayenne and the other French nobility. less bold on this occasion than the duke of Parma. represented, that notwithstanding the disaster which had befallen the royalists, it would be extremely dangerous to attack them in their intrenchments whilst their cavalry were so numerous; that when the nobility who served without pay, and were already impatient under the length of the fiege, and the rigour of the season, saw that there was no prospect of a battle, they would leave the camp, and retire to their respective homes; that the duke might then attack the king with the highest probability of success; and that till then the troops might either be employed in some other enterprise. or conducted to winter quarters, whence they might issue forth fresh and vigorous, when a more advantageous season for action should arrive. Whether Mayenne spoke from conviction on this occasion, or from his dread of the duke of Parma's acquiring too great a superiority over the king, is doubtful. Farnese was not entirely satisfied with his reasoning, and could not approve of a resolution to neglect one favourable opportunity. on account of the uncertain expectation of another. But as the proposal was perfectly consistent with his plan of protracting the war, complied with it; and having fent eight hundred felect

PHILIP II. KING OF SPAIN.

felect troops to reinforce the garrison of Rouen, he led his army back to Picardy, and invested the town of St. Esprit de Rue.

319 Book XXII. 1591.

He had no sooner set out, than the king applied himself with the utmost diligence to the prosecution of the fiege of Rouen; and as he received at this time a feafonable supply of cannon and ammunition from the States of Holland, he was enabled to carry on his operations with greater success than ever.

In a few weeks the garrison was again reduced The seperate Rouse raise to the most critical situation, and Villars, not-ed withstanding the confidence, of which he had lately given so strong a proof, was obliged to let the duke of Parma know, that if he did not return to his relief before the twentieth of April, he would find it necessary to give up the town. Mayenne was now as solicitous to persuade the duke of Parma to lead his army against the king, as he had been formerly reluctant and averse. And the duke more readily yielded to his desire, as certain intelligence had been received, that, agreeably to Mayenne's prediction, the cavalry in the king's army did not at this time amount to more than the half of their former number. Having drawn off his troops from St. Esprit de Rue, he set out without delay for Rouen, and proceeded with fo great expedition, that he performed the same march in fix days, which had formerly cost him twenty.

THE king was equally disappointed and surprised when he heard of his approach. He dreaded the danger to which his army would be exposed, if he remained in his present situation, between so brave a garrison on the one hand, and the Spanish army on the other; and he would have gone to meet the duke of Parma at a distance from the town; but finding, upon an accurate review, of his troops, that they were greatly inferior in number to the enemy, he raised the siege, after it had lasted April 20.

320

Book XXII.

1591.

for five months, and retired to Pont de l'Arche, with a resolution to wait there for the return of his nobility. The duke of Parma in the mean time advanced in battle array, and entered Rouen in a kind of triumph. From Rouen he led his army by the advice of Mayenne, and the other leaders of the league, against Caudebec; which it was thought necessary to reduce, before the deliverance of Rouen could be deemed complete.

Duke of Parms wounded at Caudebec.

In taking a review of the fortifications, and marking the ground for batteries, which he did, as on other occasions, with his own hand, he received a wound by a mulket-ball, which entered his arm a little below the elbow, and pierced downward till it lodged in his wrift. Without any change in his voice or countenance, he continued to give his orders as before, nor could his fon and the other by-standers persuade him to retire till he had instructed them fully in his designs. to discover the course of the ball, his surgeon found it necessary to make three different incisions; and the pain occasioned by these and the wound brought on a fever, which confined him to his bed for fe-This accident had almost proved fatal veral days. to his army and to the league. The fiege of Caudebec was conducted agreeably to his direction, and was foon brought to a conclusion; but in undertaking this fiege, the duke had committed the only confiderable blunder which we meet with in the history of his life. Caudebec lies in the peninfula of Caux, which is formed by the Seine on the west, and the sea and the river d'Eu, or Bresle, on the north and east. As the king, by possessing the towns of Eu, Arques, and Dieppe, commanded the entrance into Caux from the east, it was imposfible for the army of the league to get out of it, but either by croffing the Seine, or returning fouthward the same road by which they had come.

PHILIP II. KING OF SPAIN.

321 XXII. 1591.

had entered the peninsula. In this way they might Book have escaped, if they had attempted it in time; and perhaps they would have done so, had it not been judged necessary for the general's recovery, that he should remain for several days at Caudbec

THE king quickly perceived the advantage The St. 181 which was presented to him, and exerted himself ed u, in with ardour to improve it. Having immediately Cand after he had raised the siege of Rouen, dispatched messengers to summon his nobility to return to his camp, they had obeyed his summons with their wonted alacrity; and in the space of a few days, his army was augmented to seventeen thousand foot, and between seven and eight thousand horse, With this army he left Pont de L'Arche on the 30th of April, and arrived on the same day within fight of the enemy, who had encamped at Yvetot, which lies at the distance of three or four miles from Caudbec.

HENRY's first care was to fortify his camp in fuch a manner, that it might not be in the power of the enemy to compel him to engage; and his next, to make himself master of all the defiles through which they might attempt to force their passage. Many hot rencounters happened, in which both parties gave conspicuous proofs of prowess and intrepidity. The royalists were frequently repulsed from their stations, and much blood was spilt. But at last they accomplished their design, and hemmed in the enemy fo closely, that it was no longer practicable for them to approach to the outlet from the peninfula. In this fituation they remained a fortnight. Their flock of provisions was almost spent, and Henry began to indulge the flattering hope, that in a few days they would lay down their arms.

Vol. II.

Nothing

Book XXII. 1592. Their paffage of the Seine at Caudbec, Nothing but the bold inventive genius of the duke of Parma could have faved them from this disgrace: he had erred when he had entered the peninsula, while so vigilant an enemy as Henry was so near. Neither the importunity of the chiefs of the league, nor his ignorance of the country, nor the hopes of finishing his enterprize before the king could arrive, are entirely sufficient to justify his conduct. But he now fully atoned for his imprudence in exposing his troops to so great a risk, by the extraordinary capacity and vigour which he exerted in their deliverance.

As foon as he had recovered from the diffress occasioned by his wound, and taken a view of the polition and strength of the enemy, he perceived that it would be in vain to attempt to force their lines; and consequently that, there was no other way by which he could fave his army from captivity or ruin, but by transporting it over the river. To this expedient he resolved to have recourse, and he communicated his design to the duke de Mayenne, and some others of his most experienced officers, who all pronounced it to be impracticable. They knew how difficult it was to pass even the most inconsiderable river in fight of an enemy, and they could not conceive it possible for an army so much encumbered with artillery and baggage, to pass so broad a river as the Seine at Caudbec, when not only a powerful enemy, so vigilant as the king, but the Dutch ships of war likewise, were prepared to obstruct their passage.

THE duke was fully sensible of all the difficulties with which his enterprize must be attended, but as the urgent necessity of his situation would not suffer him to relinquish it, he persisted in his resolution of attempting to carry it into execution.

HAVING

HAVING first cleared the river of the Dutch Book ships, by planting batteries along the banks, he ordered the Sieur de Villars to hold all the boats and barks at Rouen in readiness and to prepare a number of rafts of strong beams sit for transporting the artillery. After this, taking advantage of a thick mist, on the 16th of May, he sent out his cavalry by day-break, as if he intended an attack, and while the enemy were thus amused, he drew off his infantry from Yvetot to Caudbec. The cavalry followed; and as foon as they had retired, the king advanced with all his forces, having no fuspicion of the duke's defign, and wondering that he should have chosen to move his camp to a situation in which it was more confined and straitened 1592.

WHILE the king was thus occupied, the duke employed a great number of pioneers in raising two forts, one on each fide of the river, directly opposite to each other, which he planted with cannon, and lined with musketeers. To prevent the king from taking the alarm, he maintained all the fame appearances as formerly, of a defign to enlarge his quarters, and frequent skirmishes were fought.

than before. Henry still thought of nothing but blocking up the passages, and fortifying his camp so as not to be obliged to accept of battle.

AT last every thing necessary being prepared, the rafts and the boats (of which there was a great number at Rouen employed in the river trade) fell down with the ebbing tide, in the evening of the 20th of May; and on the same night, the greatest part of the troops, artillery, and baggage was transported. The king perceiving early next morning a change in the appearance of the enemy's camp, sent the baron de Biron to reconnoitre it. The baron returned immediately at full gallop, calling out, that the Spaniards were pail-Y 2 ing 1592.

Book ing the river. Henry set out without delay, at the head of his cavalry. When he came in fight he had the mortification to observe, that only two or three thousand of the Spaniards remained on this fide, and that they were so skilfully defended by the fort, that he could not approach them without facrificing the lives of many of his troops. He then planted his artillery on a hill which commanded the passage, and the Dutch ships came up the river from Quillebeuf; but before the cannon were ready to fire, and before the Dutch were near enough to do execution, the rear of the Spaniards, conducted with much prudence by prince Rannucio, the duke of Parma's son, had landed safe on the other side, and set the boats on fire.

> NEITHER the king nor any of the French nobility had ever suspected that such a retreat was possible; and this circumstance, joined to the nature of the ground near Caudbec, which concealed the duke of Parma's operations, contributed not a little to the fortunate issue of his enterprise. Henry had for feveral days entertained the most fanguine hopes of gaining a decifive victory, which would probably have given him immediate possession of his kingdom; and his mortification now was in proportion to the confidence of his former expectations: it was the more fenfible and galling, as his infantry was so much exhausted by the hardships of a tedious winter's campaign, that it was impossible for him at present either to pursue the enemy, or to resume the siege of Rouen. duke de Mayenne entered this city with a part of the forces, and the duke of Parma directed his march towards the Netherlands, where he arrived in a few weeks without receiving any molestation by the way h.

> > $\mathbf{W}_{ extbf{HILE}}$

h D'Avila, lib. xiii. Bentivoglio, part ii. lib. vi. and Thuanus, lib. ciii.

0 0 K

WHILE Philip thus kept alive the flames of war in France, he had the good fortune to preserve his Spanish dominions in a state of undisturbed tranquillity; and as a kingdom in this fituation History of furnishes few materials for history, hardly any Antonio Perez. transaction passed in Spain during several years preceding the present period that deserves to be recorded; but in the course of this year an affair happened which, while it marks the character, and shews the secret life of Philip, was attended with the most serious consequences.

HAVING been engaged in a love intrigue with Anna Mendoza, princess of Eboli i, he had committed the conduct of it to his fecretary Antonio Perez, who having frequent opportunities of converling with that princels, had become no less enamoured of her than the king, and it was generally believed that she had made him a full return to the passion which her beauty had inspired. At the time when Antonio's correspondence with the princess was much talked of, Escovedo, the friend and confident of Don John of Austria, had arrived from the Netherlands, to solicit the king for the return of the Italian and Spanish forces; and finding the secretary averse from Don John's designs, he resolved to take vengeance on him, by making a discovery to the king of what was reported of Antonio's familiarity with the princess of Eboli. Philip readily believed this intelligence, and conceived an implacable resentment against the secretary; but he was animated at the same time with hatred no less implacable towards Escovedo; who, he believed, had fomented Don John's ambition, and would sooner or later engage that prince in some desperate enterprise inconsistent with his allegiance.

i The wife of Ruy Gomez de Silva.

Book XXII XXII legiance. Philip resolved to employ one of these men as the instrument of his vengeance against the other, and gave a private order to Perez to have Escovedo assassinated. This order was executed without delay, and foon afterwards a profecution was begun against the murderer, with Philip's permission, by the widow and children of Escovedo. Philip intended by this measure to remove all suspicions of being accessary to the mur-But dreading that Perez might, for his own exculpation, make a full discovery, he wrote him feveral letters with his own hand, requiring that he would conceal the order which had been given him, and affuring him, that a stop should foon be put to the profecution. It was stopped accordingly; and alth ugh Percz was forbid to come to court himfe'f, he was allowed for some years to transact the feveral branches of public business which had been intrusted to him, by his deputies or clerks. But no time could affuage the king's resentment: after fix years he commanded him to be tried for malversation in the discharge of his Office, and having ordered a fine of thirty thousand ducats to be imposed on him, he threw him into prison, and loaded him with chains. Perez was offered his liberty, on condition that he should give up all the king's letters relative to the murder of Ecovedo. He delivered some of them, and was released; but Philip was no sooner in possession of the letters, than a new process on account of the murder was commenced. Perez was again thrown into prison, and put to the torture; and he now perceived, that nothing less than his death was intended. the assistance of his wife and friends he escaped, and fled to Arragon, his native country, where he expected to avail himself of the rights and privileges of the Arragonians. Philip no fooner heard of his efcape, than he dispatched certain officers after him, who overtook him in the town of Calataiude; and having having forced him from a monastery, where he had taken refuge, conducted him to Saragossa. When he arrived in that city, he appealed to the Justiza, to whom, according to a fundamental law of the constitution, an appeal was competent from every other judge whether civil or ecclesiastical.

PHILIP II. KING OF SPAIN.

327 B o o E XXII.

By the Justiza Perez was lodged in the state prison, called the Manisestation, to remain there till his cause should be tried. But although no person could legally enter this prison, without the special permission of the Justiza, the marquis of Almenar, the king's attorney for Arragon, broke into it with a body of armed men, and carried off Perez to the prison of the inquisition. The people, who had ever been accustomed to hold the perfon and authority of the Justiza in the highest veneration, were inflamed with rage at this indignity, and having rifen tumultuoufly, they rescued Perez from the inquisitors, surrounded the marquis of Almenar, and after reviling him as traitor to the liberty of his country, maltreated him in fuch a manner that he died foon afterwards of his wounds.

Perez was again lodged in the prison of state, and remained there for several months, during which time the governor, or viceroy, ordered thirteen of the principal lawyers of Saragossa, to examine whether the cause belonged more properly to the Justiza, or to the court of inquisition. After long deliberation they declared, that it would be a violation of the liberties of Arragon, if Perez were tried by any other judge than the Justiza; but afterwards, being either corrupted or intimidated, they reversed this sentence, under the pretence of the prisoner's having held a secret correspondence with the king of France, a heretic, and pronounced that it belonged to the inquisition to take cognizance of his cause.

THE

Book XXII. The Justiza paid no regard to this opinion of the lawyers, but persisted in defending the privileges of his office, and in resusing to deliver up the prisoner. The viceroy had recourse to force; and having drawn together a great number of the samiliars of the inquisition, he broke open the state prison, loaded Perez with chains, and was carrying him off in a sort of triumph, when the people rose a second time, and set him at liberty. He immediately lest the town, and made his escape into France, where he gave useful information to the king with regard to the designs and measures of the court of Spain.

PHILIP in the mean time resolved not to neglect the opportunity which this fedition of the Arragonians afforded him, to shew how little he regarded those rights and privileges of which they had shewn themselves so tenacious. Having formed an army of the troops which were quartered in different parts of Castile, he gave the command of it to Alphonso Vargas, with instructions to march to Saragossa with the utmost expedition; and to prevent the Arragonians from preparing for relistance, he gave out that this army was intended to affift the catholics in France. The Arragonians however having received certain intelligence of his defign, began to prepare for their defence. Lanufa, the Justiza, having convened the principal inhabitants, and read to them a fundamental law of their constitution, by which it is declared, that they have a right to oppose by force the entrance of foreign troops into Arragon, even though the king himself should lead them, it was decreed with unanimous consent, that conformably to this law they should take up arms on the present occasion, to prevent the entrance of the Castilians under Vargas.

INTIMATION

Intimation of this decree was fent to the Book other cities of the province, and the inhabitants of XXIL Saragossa repaired in great numbers to the standard of liberty that was erected. But they had no leader of sufficient capacity to conduct them, and there was no time for the people in other places to come to their assistance. Vargas having arrived much fooner than they expected, they were overwhelmed with terror, and threw down their arms.

1 592.

VARGAS entered the city without opposition, The Justiza and cast such of their leaders as had not made their of Arragon escape into prison. Among these were the duke de Villa Hermofa, the count of Aranda, and the Justiza. The two first he sent prisoners to Madrid, but he put the Justiza publicly to death without either trial or sentence, and then confiscated his effects, and levelled his houses with the ground; ordering proclamation to be made in the city, that fuch would be the punishment of all these why, like Lanusa, should adventure to dispute the authority of the king.

THE people heard this infulting proclamation with unspeakable grief and indignation; but they were obliged to lament in secret the ruin of these invaluable rights which they were unable to defend. The palace of the inquisition was fortified, that it might serve the purpose of a citadel; and a strong body of Castilian troops were quartered there and in the town, where they remained till the mirds of the citizens were thoroughly subdued. Philip thought it unnecessary to abolish formally their constitution of government, as he had given them fufficient proof how inlignificant they would find it, if they should ever trust to it as a barrier against the encroachments of the regal power.

WHILE this transaction passed in Spain, the submers of duke of Parma had returned from France to the the duke of Netherlands, and from thence the bad state of his health 1592.

Digitized by Google

Book health had made it necessary for him to go once more to drink the waters at Spa. In the time of his French expedition, many of the troops which he had left behind him had mutinied; and on his return from Spa, he had the mortification to find, that prince Maurice had subdued the two important towns of Steenwich and Coverden, although the former of these places had been fortified in the ftrongest manner, and was defended by a brave and determined garrison of one thousand six hundred men.

> THE duke's chagrin at these events, contributed to quicken the progress of his disease, which having baffled the power of medicine, had now reduced him so low, that finding himself unable to fulfil the duties of his office, he had applied to the king for liberty to retire.

His death.

١

Bur Philip believing that no other person was fo able to bring his schemes in France to the defired issue, refused to grant his request; and when he fignified his refusal, sent him instructions to return as foon as possible to the assistance of the League. The duke would not desert a station which he had filled with so much honour, and resolved to struggle with his diffemper to the laft. Having by new levies supplied some of the vacancies in his army, he went, on the 20th of October, to Arras, and there applied with his wonted assiduity to hasten the necessary preparations for his expedition. strength of his mind counterbalanced for several weeks the weakness of his body. From the vigour which he displayed, those about him conceived hopes that his death was still at a considerable dis-But on the 3d of December, immediately after figning some dispatches which had been prepared for his subscription, he expired in the fortyfeventh feventh year of his age, and the francatth of his Bank XXII.

In this manner died Alexar der Farreie, duke of and and Parma, who claims our admiration, no less for his inpolitical wildem and fagatiry, than on account of those more splendid military talents which have procured him such diffinguithed renown. It was by his prudence, moderation, and address, more than by the force of arms, that he re-united io great a part of the Netherlands to the Spanish monarchy; and if Philip had paid the same regard to his opinion on all occasions, which he did on some, it is probable that the United Provinces would have been compelled to return to their a legiance. England might in that case have been subdued, and France might have been swa'lowed up by the exorbitant power of Spain. Though it was happy for Europe that Philip, blinded by flattery and ambition, refused to listen to the counsels that were offered him, yet we must admire that superior sagacity and penetration by which they were fuggested.

THE duke of Parma in his youth gave no indications of those extraordinary qualities with which nature had endowed him, and men were even disposed to think unfavourably of his understanding; but in the war with the Turks, in which he served under John of Austria, the slame of his genius broke forth, and burnt afterwards through the whole of his life with unabating splendor. His person was graceful, his eyes lively and penetrating, his manners courteous, his address infinuating, and his temper generous and humane.

His vices, fays a respectable Dutch writer k, were those of the age in which he lived, or of the court k Grotius.

332

XXII. 1592.

Book court in which he had been educated; but what these vices were, neither this, nor any other historian has informed us. He appears not to have posfessed that winning simplicity of manners, that per-fect ingenuity and candour, by which his great rival for military fame, the French monarch, was fo eminently diftinguished; yet the protestant, as well as popish historians acknowledge, that as he was dutiful and faithful to his prince, so he maintained the most inviolable fidelity in all his engagements with the people of the Netherlands who submitted to his arms.

THE

XXIII.

before the king could arrive to their relief. From Noyon the troops were led into Lower Picardy, where fome inconfiderable places were reduced. But foon after this fuccefs, count Maniveldt with the Spanish army returned to the Netherlands; and the operations of war were interrupted by certain political negociations, from which i'hilip expected to derive greater advantage than from the progress of his arms.

the §

ec th

Bi Fran

dece

cret! tizzn

ည် တွ

in ar

Pect

pag

Rive

they

the that фei

diff

DO:

the

XFFF

H.H.

ø

D¢.

th

a

Þ

Convention of the States of the League,

HAVING, during several years, wasted the blood and treasure of his subjects, in fomenting the war in France, in expectation of some favourable opportunity of feizing upon the crown, his patience had been for some time past exhausted; and he had resolved to make trial, whether it was practicable to realife those alluring hopes by which he had so long been actuated. With this view his minifters had repeatedly requested the duke of Mayenne to summon an affembly of the States of the League, that it might be known what catholic Prince they inclined to choose for their sovereign. ftill cherished the hopes of attaining the sovereignty himself, in some future more favourable crisis; and he abhorred the thoughts of having the French nation subjected to the dominion of Spain. Influenced by these motives, he had on different pre-tences declined for several months complying with Philip's request; but finding that he would not be diverted from his purpose, the duke had yielded to his importunity, and as lieutenant general of the kingdom, had iffued a furnmons for the States to meet at Paris on the 26th of January, one thoufand five hundred and ninety-three. Philip fent the duke of Feria, and Mendoza, an eminent Spanih lawyer, to this affembly; and he fondly ima-gined, that by their influence, and that of the cardinal of Piacenza, the pope's legate, a majority of the deputies might be perfuaded to abrogate

Digitized by Google

XXIII.

1593-

Book before the king could arrive to their relief. From Noyon the troops were led into Lower Picardy, where some inconsiderable places were reduced. But soon after this success, count Mansveldt with the Spanish army returned to the Netherlands; and the operations of war were interrupted by certain political negociations, from which Philip expected to derive greater advantage than from the progress of his arms.

Convention of the States of the League.

HAVING, during several years, wasted the blood and treasure of his subjects, in fomenting the war in France, in expectation of some favourable opportunity of feizing upon the crown, his patience had been for some time past exhausted; and he had refolved to make trial, whether it was practicable to realife those alluring hopes by which he had fo long been actuated. With this view his ministers had repeatedly requested the duke of Mayenne to fummon an affembly of the States of the League, that it might be known what catholic Prince they inclined to choose for their sovereign. Mayenne fill cherished the hopes of attaining the sovereignty himself, in some future more favourable criss; and he abhorred the thoughts of having the French nation subjected to the dominion of Spain. Influenced by these motives, he had on different pretences declined for several months complying with Philip's request; but finding that he would not be diverted from his purpose, the duke had yielded to his importunity, and as lieutenant-general of the kingdom, had iffued a furmons for the States to meet at Paris on the 26th of January, one thoufand five hundred and ninety-three. Philip fent the duke of Feria, and Mendoza, an eminent Spanish lawyer, to this assembly; and he fondly imagined, that by their influence, and that of the cardinal of Piacenza, the pope's legate, a majority of the deputies might be perfuaded to abrogate the the Salic law, and to place his daughter Isabella Book on the throne.

But it soon appeared how much his ministers in 1593. France had deceived him, and been themselves Philip's Neither the money which he had fe- views. deceived. cretly bestowed to increase the number of his partizans, nor the armies which he had employed at fo great an expence in their behalf, had produced in any confiderable degree the effects which he expected. Some of the greatest bigots in the party, and some of the lowest of the people only, had given credit to his professions of zeal for religion; even the eyes of these men were now opened, and they perceived how little they had been indebted to the friendship of a prince, who now discovered, that his principal design in assisting them against their enemies, had been to take advantage of their distress, and to reduce them to the unhappy condition of a province of Spain. For it was in this light they confidered his propofal; and were no less alarmed at his demand of their crown for Isabella. than if he had demanded it for himself. In these fentiments the deputies were fecretly confirmed by Mayenne. But as both he and they were conscious that they were utterly unable to contend with Henry, if Philip should forsake them, they studied to conceal their aversion to his proposal. neither agreed to it, nor rejected it; but expressed their solicitude with regard to the person whom the catholic king should make choice of for his daughter's husband; and insisted, that in the event of her election, she should not be married to any foreign prince.

THE Spanish ministers informed them, that their master had indeed designed to give her in marriage to Ernest archduke of Austria; but since it was not agreeable to the States, he was willing to beВоок XXIII.

1593.

flow her upon the duke of Guise. The duke de Mayenne did not expect this concession, and was greatly disconcerted when the Spanish ministers produced instructions, empowering them to make it. He was stung with the preference which was given to his nephew before his fon; and he now secretly resolved to obstruct the election of Isabella, to the utmost of his power. Finding it necessary however to disguise his sentiments, he affected to be highly pleased with the proposal; but alleged that a regard to the honour of his catholic majesty, as well as to the safety of the duke of Guise, required that the election of Isabella should be deferred till an army was affembled, sufficient to overpower her enemies, and to fix her upon the throne. At present there was no army in France able to contend with the king of Navarre, and a confiderable time must elapse before so great a force as was necessary could be raised. The Spanish ministers were fensible of the strength of this objection, they that, without the affiftance of likewise knew Mayenne, they could not persuade the States to proceed to the election, and therefore, without great opposition, they agreed to a delay. manner did the duke de Mayenne, influenced partly by ambition, and partly by concern for the freedom and independence of the kingdom, difappoint for the present Philip's plan to enslave it; and other events afterwards happened, which would have rendered it impossible, even for Mayenne himself, had he been so inclined, to carry it into execution.

Henry IV. embraces religion.

THE king of France, who knew the purpose for the catholic which the States had been convened, though he was in a great measure ignorant of Mayenne's views, dreaded violently his concurring with the Spaniards; and felt great anxiety with respect to the consequences which might follow. For Philip, lip, he believed, would regard an election made Book by the States of the League, though only a small XXIII. part of the kingdom, as a sufficient foundation for his daughter's claim, and would employ all his power to support it, whatever prejudice might thence arise to his affairs in the Netherlands. the first opening of the assembly, Henry published an edict, declaring it to be illegal. And he gave permission, at the same time, to the catholic lords of his party, to enter into a conference with those of the League; intending to prevent the States from proceeding to extremities, by affording them the prospect of his speedy conversion to the popish faith.

1593-

This expedient was in some measure attended with the defired effect. The nobility of the League, disquieted with the apprehensions of being reduced under the dominion of Spain, and conscious, that if Philip should abandon them, they must soon yield to the king's victorious arms, were thrown into extreme perplexity; and many of them shewed that nothing was wanting but Henry's conversion, to determine them to acknowledge his authority. This condition however was still as necessary as ever. From the long continuance of the war, their religious prejudices were become unconquerable. With these their sense of honour and confistency conspired, and their regard to an oath which they had sworn, never to acknowledge an heretical prince for their fovereign. They were confirmed in their resolution, by the pope's legate, and by the archbishop of Lyons, and other partizans of Spain; and were still as much determined as ever to adhere to their engagements, without regard to any inconveniences or dangers, to which they might thereby be exposed.

WHILE the delay of the king's conversion proved an infurmountable objection against him with the members Vol. II.

1593.

Book members of the League, it gave the most sensible uneafiness to such of the catholics as had espoused his cause. They had been induced to remain with him, after the death of the late king, by his promile of embracing their religion. They had often urged him to fulfil this promise. Amidst the hurry of arms, he had found it easy to employ excuses, with which they had hitherto been satisfied. But their patience was now exhausted. tertained fuspicions that he had dealt infincerely with them. Though brave and warlike, they were fick of the hardships and fatigues of war; and they began to hold conferences together, on the subject of transferring their allegiance to Henry's cousin. the cardinal of Bourbon. Henry perceived that the critical period was now come, when he must resolve either to change his religion, or to forego the crown, and expose himself and his protestant fubjects to the fury and vengeance of all the catholics in France, supported by his inveterate enemy the king of Spain. Even some of the protestant leaders were fo candid as to acknowledge, that without embracing the catholic faith, he would never be able to preserve possession of the throne: and they exhorted him to embrace it, if his confcience would permit, as the only means by which they, as well as his other subjects, could be saved from ruin.

> NEVER was an ingenuous prince placed in a more distressful situation. And never was a virtuous mind affailed by temptations more alluring. For he was not impelled only by ambition, or the defire of securing a great and mighty monarchy to himself, and his posterity. The desire of delivering his people from calamities, which were become intolerable, co-operated with his ambition, and both together put his integrity to the severest trial.

Without

PHILIP II. KING OF SPAIN.

339 1593.

WITHOUT any longer delay, he invited the ca- Book tholic divines throughout his kingdom, to come XXIII. and instruct him in the principles of their religion; and having heard him discourse concerning several of the points in dispute between the protestants and them, he declared himself entirely satisfied with their arguments, and soon afterwards went to mass in the church of St. Dennis, where he read aloud his confession of the catholic faith, and promised to maintain and defend it, against whatever attempts might be made for its subversion.

HENRY's conduct on this occasion was very differently interpreted by his cotemporaries, according as they stood well or ill affected to his person, or to the religion which he had embraced. alleged by some, that he had given a convincing proof of his indifference with regard to all religion, and that his conversion could be considered in no other light, but as hypocrify and grimace. But others more justly observed, that if Henry had been capable of so great infincerity as his enemies ascribed to him, he would have listened to his interest at a much earlier period, and not have so long exposed himself to the danger of being for ever excluded from the throne. That no other satisfactory account could be given of his delay, but the scruples with which his regard to truth and his sense of honour had inspired him. That it was not surprising, that a prince who nad passed his life amidst the tumults of war, should have been but very imperfectly acquainted with the niceties of theological disputes; or that his opinions in matters of such difficult decision, should have been gradually bent to a compliance with so great an interest as he had at stake. And considering how candid and sincere he had ever shewn himself in all his conduct, it might justly be supposed that he had still preferved his integrity, and that his religious fentiments

Digitized by Google

Bookhad in reality undergone that change which he now expressed with so much seeming seriousness and folemnity. 1593.

WHATEVER were the real motives of Henry's Henry's ton-conduct, it diffused a general joy and satisfaction among his subjects. Worn out with the miseries of fo long a war, they exulted at the prospect of peace, though still at some distance, and being now freed from the fascination of their religious prejudices, they could perceive and admire those illustrious virtues in the character of their sovereign. by which he was so highly qualified to make them happy.

> THE Spanish ministers, on the other hand, the cardinal legate, and the duke de Mayenne, were greatly alarmed at this event, and still more when they observed the reception which the news of it met with among the people. They represented it as a political device, intended to prevent the election of a catholic prince. They perfuaded a great number of their adherents to swear that they would not acknowledge Henry for king, unless his conversion were ratified by the pope: and at the fame time they employed all their influence at the court of Rome, to diffuade the pope from granting him an absolution.

Philip fill adheres to his plan.

340

Effects of Terlion.

PHILIP was not discouraged from the prosecution of his scheme, either by the opposition which it had received from the States of the League, or by the conversion of the king. He became sensible however of his error in pitching on the duke of Guile (a young nobleman indeed of great merit and moderation, but possessed of little power or influence) for his daughter's partner in the throne. This error he corrected, and ordered his ministers to acquaint the duke de Mayenne, that he was now determined to give the preference to bis son. confequence consequence of this declaration, a negociation which Mayenne had begun for reconciling himself, to the king, was broken off. That powerful leader and the Spaniards were henceforth on more amicable terms; and there was no longer any reason to doubt, that in future he would exert himself with vigour in promoting their defigns *.

PHILIP IL KING OF SPAIN.

341 1593.

But there was much less probability at the pre- State of his fent than any former period, that these designs affairs. would ever be accomplished. Philip had no general after the duke of Parma's death, qualified to enter the lifts with the king of France. His treasury was exhausted, and even his credit was reduced so low, that the Genoese, and other Italian merchants, from whom he had already borrowed several millions of money, refused to lend him any more. His commanders in the Netherlands had not been able to make the necessary levies. His troops there were fewer in number than they had ever been fince the commencement of the war; and yet fo great arrears were due to him, that the officers found it impracticable to maintain their authority. The grearest part of the Spanish soldiers in the Low Countries had, upon their return from France, forfaken their standards; and having elected officers, and a commander in chief from among themfelves, they had begun to exercise the most oppresfive rapacity upon the inhabitants of the fouthern provinces.

THE example of the Spaniards was quickly hellowed by the Italians and Walloons. The printe in the open country were plundered in the mist unmerciful manner. Those dreadful scenes of devaltation were renewed, which had been acted after the death of Requesens; and the Flornings had never suffered so much from the enemy, as they SULA

D'Avila, lib. xiv. Thusays, lib. cri, vis.

Digitized by Google

342

Book now suffered from troops engaged to protect and defend them.

1593. Siege of PRINCE Maurice in the mean time exerted all Gertruden- his wonted activity to improve the advantage which these disorders afforded him, for extending the territories of the States. There was no town which the confederates were more defirous of acquiring than Gertrudenberg; which, as it lies nearer them than Breda, subjected them to perpetual anxiety for the preservation of that important city; besides giving annoyance to their inland trade, and furnishing the Spaniards with an easy entrance into Holland.

> During the winter, Maurice had made diligent preparation for the siege of this place; and early in the fpring, he was ready to take the field with such an army as he judged sufficient to ensure success. In order to prevent the enemy from suspecting his design, he directed his march first towards Sluys and Dunkirk; afterwards to Bois-le-Duc and Grave; and when by these feints he had induced count Mansveldt to divide his forces, he turned fuddenly to Gertrudenberg.

MANSVELDT, anxious to avoid the reproach to which the loss of a place of so great consequence would expose him, drew together all the forces which could be spared from the garrisons of the other towns, with an intention to attempt to raise the fiege. Prince Maurice expected this, and conducted his operations with the utmost celerity. Not only his pioneers, amounting to three thoufand, but a great number of his troops were employed day and night in fortifying his camp, both on the fide towards the town, to prevent the eruptions of the garrison, and on the side towards the country. And not fatisfied with this, he broke down the the dike of the river, and laid a great part of the Book adjacent country under water. After which, having approached the town as usual by trenches, he opened batteries against it at different places; and kept up a continual fire upon it from his fleet, on the fide towards the river

XXIII. 1593.

THE garrison consisted of Burgundians and Walloons, made a brave and vigorous refistance, and thereby gave count Mansveldt time to advance to their relief. The count's army amounted to more than double the number of the beliegers; and he attacked their intrenchments in different places, where the inundation permitted his approach. But Maurice had constructed his works with so much art, and strengthened them in such a manner with forts and redoubts, at proper distances, that all count Mansveldt's attempts proved ineffectual. His quarters were at the same time greatly streightened by the garrison of Breda, which sallied out upon him, and made confiderable flaughter among his troops. He found it necessary to retire, and Gertrudenberg soon afterwards capitulated. In the garrison there were several of those soldiers, who some years before had sold the town to the Spanie ards. These men suffered the punishment due to their treachery, but all the rest, and the inhabitants of the place, received the most advantagences and honourable terms.

COUNT Mansveldt had, in order to retrieve his honour, by making reprifals upon the enemy, bet his army from Gertrudenberg, to invest an invest tant fort belonging to the confederates, cal est (100 vecæur. But this attempt likewife was friffingered by the celerity of Maurice, who arrived before it. count's lines were finished; got between but and b The Maese at Gertrudenberg is more proper y a money of the sea than a river, and admits of the will is it. ye 344 the fort, and though greatly inferior in number, Book XXIII. obliged him quickly to raise the siege.

1594-

DURING the rest of the campaign, Mansveldt acted on the defensive; and no other event happened in the Netherlands this year, that deserves to be recorded c.

Erneft, arch Netherlands.

ALTHOUGH Philip had, after the death of the duke of Au-duke of Parma, committed the government to count firit, Gover-duke of Parma, committed the government to count Mansveldt, he had from the first intended that the count should resign it into the hands of Ernest archduke of Austria. This prince arrived in the beginning of the year one thousand five hundred and ninety-four at Brussels, and was received there with every mark of joy and satisfaction. a prince of a modest and gentle disposition; but he possessed not the capacity and vigour requisite in the present critical situation of affairs. Conscious of his want of military talents, he fondly flattered himself with the hopes of prevailing on the revolted provinces to return to their allegiance by argument and perfuasion. And with this view, he fent an invitation to the States to appoint ambaffadors to treat with him concerning peace. the States rejected his invitation, and accompanied their refusal with declaring, "That as from experience they could not repose any confidence in the king of Spain, so they would never enter into any treaty of reconcilement with him; but would maintain their liberty to the last, and lay down their lives sooner than submit to that intolerable yoke from which they had been so happily delivered."

> Ir it is true, as the Dutch historians relate, that two murderers were detected at this time, whom the Spanish

Bentivoglio and Grotius, lib. iii.

PHILIP I TO FIFE END

Spanish minimises and appear to the minimises of the fines in the minimises and the fines in the fines in the fines of the fines in the fines and the fines in the fines and the fines and the power of fines. For finish, the fines was fill more minimises as the finish the fines was fill more minimises as the finish the fines of the fines of the finish the fines of the finish the finis

The fination of affine a fine implied become time of daily more unfortunate in the very. And the king's convenion from produces the happy effects which were expected in suit from a

The crizers of Ment were the first with Rich was him a tender of the liberature; box long title promise. wards, the Purises spened their gues to marine many him; and the example of the metropics which had ever been the onei firengin of the Learner was quickly followed by Rocen, Lyons, and a'most all the other great towns in the kingdom. Henry's conduct was admirably calculated to promote that affectionate zeal of his full ects, of which he received at this time to many itnixing proofs. For several years he had suffered from them the most cruel injuries and affronts; but his generous spirit, superior to refertment, abhorred the thought of punishing those who were willing to lay down their arms, and he received the submission of his most inveterate enemies, with a degree of goodness and condescension, which while it won tiving hearts, determined many others to imitate their example.

Hz granted to all who submitted to him, the most favourable terms; confirmed their privileges, as if they had done nothing to forfeit them; adhered with inviolable fidelity to his engagements; and published an edict of general indemnity, in order to set the minds of the people every where at ease, and to convince them that it would be their fault, and not his, if the public tranquillity were not speedily restored.

B o o k AXIII.

1594.

346

By these measures, which were equally prudent and magnanimous, the strength of the League was reduced so low, that Philip and the duke de Mayenne might have easily perceived the vanity of their designs.

Philips's motives for profecuting the war.

IT can hardly be imagined, that either the one or the other could any longer feriously entertain the hopes of success. But Mayenne was so deeply engaged with the Spaniards, that he knew not how to extricate himself with honour; especially as he had folemnly fworn, with many others of his party, that he would never acknowledge Henry for his sovereign, till he should receive absolution from the pope. And though Philip could not now be so chimerical, as to expect to procure the crown for Isabella, yet he could not overcome that implacable hatred, with which he had long been animated against the French monarch, in whom (judging of Henry from himself) he expected to find an irreconcilable and mortal foe. Besides, he was not ignorant of the justice of Henry's claim to the kingdom of Navarre, which Ferdinand the catholic had wrested from Henry's ancestors by fraud and violence; and he could not doubt that this active victorious prince would, as foon as his affairs were settled in France, either attempt to recover his hereditary kingdom, or endeavour to procure a compensation for it, by invading the Spanish dominions in the Netherlands.

Moved by these considerations, Philip resolved to continue his hostilities, and by joining his forces with with those of the duke de Mayenne, to make him- Book felf mafter of as many towns as possible on the easttern frontier of France.

PHILIP II. KING OF SPAIN.

347 1594.

This resolution he communicated to the arch-Siege of La duke Ernest; who, agreeably to his instructions. Capelle. fent count Charles of Mansveldt early in the spring to invade the province of Picardy, with an army of between eleven and twelve thousand men. The count laid fiege to the town of La Capelle; and as he attacked it unexpectedly, he soon obliged the 9th May. garrison to capitulate.

THE king had set out from Paris as soon as he siege of received intelligence of the fiege, but could not land. arrive in time to prevent the surrender. been joined on his march by the dukes de Nevers and Bouillon, and finding himself at the head of a considerable army, he resolved to undertake fome important enterprise, by which he might be compensated for the loss of La Capelle. One of the most considerable towns in that part of the kingdom was Laon, a place of great extent, strongly fortified, and well provided with every thing necessary to sustain a siege. The garrison, which was numerous, was commanded by Du Bourg, one of the bravest officers of the League; and there was at that time in the town, besides a great number of other nobility, the count of Somerive, the duke de Mayenne's second son. These considerations, far from discouraging the king from belieging Laon, were the motives which determined him to invest it, and he carried on his operations against it with his usual activity and vigilance.

THE befieged gave him all the annoyance and interruption in their power; and in some sallies which they made, before he had time to cover his troops, e Twelve thousand foot, and two thousand horse.

348

XXIII.

1594.

Book troops, he lost more than four hundred men. But his anxiety with regard to the iffue of his enterprife, arole principally from the neighbourhood of the Spanish army, which was joined at this time by the duke de Mayenne, whom Philip, in order to prevent him from entering into an accommodation with the king, had intrusted with the chief command.

Mayenne attempta in vain to raife the fiege.

Various motives concurred on this occasion to determine Mayenne to exert himself with vigour. There was much need of some splendid instance of fuccess to support the drooping spirits of his party. Laon was the most considerable town which remained in his possession; and besides his son, and many of his faithful adherents, he had left his most valuable effects in it, as in a place where there was little danger of their falling into the hands of the enemy. He lost no time in marching to its relief. His army confifted of nearly the same number as that of the king, but being inferior in cavalry, he found it necessary to approach the town on that fide, on which there lay a wood or forest, where the enemy's horse could not be easily employed. Henry had penetrated into his design, and taken possession of the wood with a part of his troops. Mayenne at first obliged them to retire; but the royalists having immediately received a reinforcement from the camp, returned to the charge, and stood their ground for some time with great bravery against the Spanish veterans. would have been compelled however to give way a fecond time, if the royal cavalry, which had advanced to their relief, under the baron a now marshal de Biron, had not, conformably to their valiant leader's example and command, difmounted from their horses, and thrown themselves into the front

d His father had been lately killed at the fiege of Epernay.

349

front of the battle. The king himself soon after Book came up with the greatest part of his army; and, XXIII. if the ground had permitted it, a general engagement would have enfued, but it allowed only of skirmishes, which continued with various success till the evening; when Mayenne, dreading that the king might fend his cavalry to attack his rear, drew off his forces to a little distance from the wood.

ALTHOUGH the nature of the ground in this rencounter prevented the king from availing himself of the superiority of his cavalry, yet this superiority proved afterwards of the greatest use. Mayenne being obliged to bring his provisions through an open country, from places at the diftance of several miles, the king sent out his horse in numerous bodies to intercept his convoys; and although the duke attempted to bring them under a strong guard in the night, sometimes from one place and sometimes from another, yet such was the vigilance of the duke de Longueville, and the marshal de Biron, to whom the king gave the charge of intercepting them, that almost none of them were suffered to escape. These bold adventurous leaders were continually in motion. guards which Mayenne could spare were able to withstand their vigorous attacks, and his army was at last reduced to so great distress, as made it necessary for him to decamp. He was senfible how difficult he must find it to retire in the face of a superior enemy: but if he remained any longer in his present situation, his troops, he perceived, must either perish for want, or lay down their arms.

THE duke had hitherto been unfortunate in his Hismasterly enterprises, and his misfortunes had contributed to retreat. obscure his fame; but on this occasion, he gave a conspicuous proof of consummate military skill.

Book XXIII.

350

1594.

as well as of the most unquestionable personal courage and resolution. His troops drawn up in the most masterly manner, were every where so well prepared to receive the enemy, that the king, who attacked them with his cavalry as foon as they began their march, found it utterly impracticable to penetrate their ranks, whilst Mayenne himself marched on foot in the rear, fought on some occasions as a common soldier, and by the gracefulness of his person, added to the fortitude which he displayed, commanded universal admiration. In this manner he advanced flowly, till he reached a narrow defile, where he had planted fome batteries of cannon; from the dread of which, the king ordered his troops to halt, and suffered the duke to pursue his march to La Fere without any farther molestation.

Laon furrenders.

HENRY then refumed his operations before the town. The besieged, though deprived of all hopes of relief, perfifted for some time in their defence; but at last, finding their numbers greatly diminished, they offered to surrender on condition that the garrison and the count of Somerive should be allowed to march out with the honours of war: and to this condition the king readily confented, from his defire of preventing bloodshed, and of faving the fortifications of the town. The capitulation was figned on the 22d of July. The terms of it were religiously fulfilled; and Henry, far from discovering ill humour or resentment for the opposition which he had met with, embraced with pleasure the present opportunity of testifying his esteem for the duke de Mayenne, by shewing particular marks of respect and kindness to his son.

Submiffion of the duke of Guile.

So much goodness, united with so much heroism and magnanimity, had charms in the eyes of Henry's ry's enemi-s that were irrefiftible. The reduction of Laon, and his generous treatment of the inhabitants and garrison, were quickly followed by the voluntary furrender of Chateau-Thierry, Amiens, and Cambray. The duke of Lorrain, who from the beginning had given his affistance to the League, chose now to be at peace with a prince, in whose favour fortune, and his own ments, had produced fo remarkable a revolution. And the duke of Guile whom the Spaniards had tantalized with a glimple of royaity, but had afterwards neglected, moved partly by this confideration, and partly by his admiration of the king, entered into a treaty of reconciliation with him; and having delivered to him the towns of Rheims, Vitry, Rocroix, and several other places in Champaigne, he was rewarded by Henry with the government of Provence e.

PHILIP IL KING OF SPAIN.

Book

DURING the course of these events, so adverse Siege of Groningen to Philip's views in France, prince Maurice was by prince engaged in the most important enterprise which he Maurice. had hitherto undertaken, the fiege of Groningen. That city, though almost surrounded with the territories of the States, had been preserved till now in its allegiance to Philip, by Verdugo, a Spanish officer of great abilities, with whole affiltance the catholic part of the inhabitants had been able to keep the protestants under subjection. Jealous however of their liberty, they had never consented to admit any Spanish garrison within their walls, but three thousand of the citizens trained to the use of arms had been inlifted in the king's service for the defence of the town, while nine hundred of his foreign troops were permitted to take up their quarters in the fuburbs.

MAURICE

e D'Avila, lib. xiv. Thuanus, lib. ci. Meteren, lib. xiii-Bentivoglio, ann. 1594; and Sully's Memoirs, lib. vi.

Digitized by Google

1594.

B o o K XXII. 1594.

MAURICE had long meditated the reduction of Groningen, not only because it would be of itself an acquisition of great value to the confederacy. but because it was the only place of consequence in those parts under the Spanish dominion, and furnished an easy entrance to the Spaniards into the northern provinces. Much pains had been taken and great exertions made by Verdugo for its security. Many bloody rencounters had passed between him and the forces of the states, in which, from the smallness of his numbers, and not from the want either of bravery or conduct, he was generally unsuccessful; and Maurice, powerfully seconded in all his operations by his coufin count William of Nassau, had at length reduced Verdugo to the necessity of quitting the province, and had made himself master of almost every pass by which the citizens could receive affiftance or fupplies.

THEY had not neglected to inform the archduke of the imminent danger to which they were exposed. At their request, the emperor of Germany had transmitted to Philip a representation, importing that although they defired nothing so much as to maintain their allegiance, and had preserved it long amidst much greater hardships and difficulties than any of his other subjects had endured, yet if the army were not immediately fent to their affistance, they would foon find it necessary to open their gates to the enemy. Philip, far from difregarding their application, made them the most gracious and flattering reply; and fent orders to the archduke to postpone every other object in the Netherlands to the relief of Groningen. greatest part of his forces were at this time engaged in the war in Picardy; and the remainder having mutinied against their officers, on account of their want of pay, refuled to obey the governor's commands.

PRINCE

1594

PRINCE Maurice therefore applied to the profe- Book cution of the fiege, with very little apprehenfion XXIII. of meeting with any interruption from the Spaniards, although agreeably to his usual cautious maxims, he not only fortified his quarters, but likewife the feveral passes which led to them from the fouthern provinces. By beginning to open his trenches at a distance from the town, the siege was fomewhat retarded, but he thereby prevented the loss of men which would otherwise have been suftained. On the third of June his batteries were unmasked, and soon afterwards all the out-works were laid in ruins. The belieged, alarmed with the rapidity of his progress, called the foreign troops, which were quartered in the fuburbs, to their assistance. The defence was conducted for feveral weeks with the highest spirit and intrepidity, and much blood was spilt. But Maurice having blown up a ravelin, which was one of the principal defences of the place, the courage of the inhabitants began to fail, and there was nothing to be heard but complaints of the ingratitude of the king, in thus abandoning to their enterprising enemy a people so distinguished for their attachment and fidelity.

THEIR chief magistrate, Van Balen, who had long been secretly averse from the Spanish government, improved with great dexterity the opportunity which their present temper afforded him. He studied to confirm them in their sentiments of the king's ingratitude; he represented to them the folly of flattering themselves with the hopes of relief from a prince, who was more intent upon conquering the dominions of others, than providing for the security of his own. He painted in strong colours the miseries which they must suffer, if either the siege were to be prolonged, or the town to be taken by affault; and by expatiating on the advantages which would accrue to them from ac-Vol. II.

Book XXIII.

1594.

354

ceding to the union of Utrecht; he endeavoured to make them sensible, that if freedom from a foreign yoke was an object to be defired, it was infinitely more for their interest to submit to the generous enemy, who now befieged them, than even to be delivered from the fiege.

THESE exhortations made the defired impression even upon the minds of those who were most attached to the catholic religion. That attachment had been long their only tie to the Spanish government; and it was overcome at this time by their indignation on account of Philip's negligence in providing for their defence, joined to their defire of participating of that civil liberty which had proved the source of so much prosperity and happiness to the confederated provinces.

Groningen united to

A DEPUTATION of the principal inhabitants was the confede- fent to treat of a surrender; and the prince, without hesitation, granted them the most advantageous The city of Groningen was declared to be henceforth a member of the union of Utrecht. All the exemptions and ancient privileges of the inhabitants were confirmed; the civil government of the place was allowed to remain on the same footing as before, and liberty of conscience was established, with this restriction, that no other religion but the reformed should be publicly exer-The citizens on the other hand engaged to acknowledge the supremeauthority of the States; to submit to the general laws of the union; to contribute their share of the public expences; and to admit such a garrison into the town as the States should judge necessary for its security. The foreign foldiers were permitted to depart with their arms and baggage. The capitulation was figned on the 23d of July; and on the same day prince Maurice entered the town. He remained in it for for some time till certain articles of the capitulation Book were executed, after which, having committed the XXIII. government to his kinfman, count William of Naffau, he fet out for the Hague s.

WHILE Philip's power suffered so great a dimi- Mortiny of nution in the northern provinces, his affairs in the Spanish and Italian Brabant were daily more and more involved in foldiers. disorder and confusion. The archduke had, with the utmost difficulty, raised money to satisfy the Walloon and Spanish mutineers; but no sooner had these men returned to their duty, than the Italians to whom the fame arrears were due, refolved to employ the same means to effectuate their payment. Many of the officers concurred with the private men in forming this resolution, and they put it instantly into execution, by seizing on the town of Sichen, where a part of their number had been stationed. They were joined by foldiers from all the garrisons in the neighbourhood, who continued flocking to them, till they amounted to two thousand horse and foot.

Nor fatisfied with laying the country round the The mutitown under contribution, they spread themselves tested by over the province, made excursions to the very Maurice. gates of Brussels where the governor resided, and plundered the people with as much cruelty as if they had been engaged in open war. The governor having tried the power of persuasion without effect, resolved to employ force to reduce them; and for this purpose he sent the Spanish troops which he had lately pacified, under Lewis de Velasco, to beliege Sichen. In the beginning of this fedition, prince Maurice had made the mutineers an offer of shelter and protection in the territories of the States, and they readily agreed to accept this offer in case they should find it neces-

8 Meteren, lib. zvii. Bentivoglio, part iii. lib. i. Grotius, lib. iii.

356

Воок XXIII.

1594.

ceffary; but informed him, that they would defend themselves in Sichen as long as they were able, against the Spaniards. They accordingly did so, and made several desperate sallies, in which many on both fides were flain. Finding however that the place was too weak to be long defended against an enemy so much superior in number, they retired under the fortifications of Breda and San Gertrudenberg, where provisions were fold to His motive, them by the subjects of the States. The intention of Maurice in this fingular treatment of an enemy, was only to prolong the term of their disobedience. He made no attempt to persuade them to enter into the service of the confederacy, but gave permission to the archduke to send an ambassador to treat with them; and when, after a tedious negociation, they had agreed to take up their quarters in Tirlemont, and to remain there till their demands were fatisfied, without renewing their hostilities, Maurice readily allowed them to depart. They required a Spanish nobleman to be given as a hostage for the fulfilment of the governor's promises; and so great was the disorder of the king's finances at this period, that these troops were suffered to remain inactive at Tirlemont for near a year before their arrears were paid h.

Before the expiration of this term, the gover-Erneft, and nor was seized with a hectic fever, of which he died on the 20th of February, in the forty-second Fuentes go- year of his age. He named the count of Fuentes for his successor, and his choice was soon after ratified by the king. This nobleman having been fent into the Netherlands a little before the death of the duke of Parma, had, agreeably to Philip's instructions, during the government of count Mansveldt and the archduke, possessed a principal share in the administration. By his advice, or more pro-h Grotius, lib. iii. Meteren, lib. xvii. p. 581. Bentivoglio. part iii. lib. i.

PHILIP II. KING OF SPAIN.

357 Book XXIII. 1594.

properly by his authority, count Mansveldt had published a barbarous edict, commanding all prisoners to be put to death; and ordering the king's troops who, in their excursions into the territories of the States, had been satisfied for several years past with levying contributions, henceforth to lay waste the country with fire and fword.

THE States, in return, published a manifesto, in which they expressed their abhorrence of this barbarity; but at the same time declared, that if the governor did not recall his edict against a certain time, they would retaliate the cruelty which it prescribed upon the troops and subjects of the king. This measure had been urged by Fuentes, on the pretence of shortening the duration of the war, although the experience of his kin(man, the duke of Alva, might have convinced him that, considering the strength to which the confederacy had attained, it would ferve only to increase the calamities of the war, and to render it perpetual. Count Mansveldt came soon to be sensible that these must be the consequences, and either revoked his edict. or gave orders to prevent it from being carried into execution.

FUENTES however still continued to exercise an Discontent unlimited influence in the government. The Fle- of the 1 inmish nobility complained bitterly, as in the time of cardinal Granvelle, of the infignificance to which they were reduced, and before the death of the archduke they had given some striking proofs of their discontent. This discontent was greatly heightened when the count was appointed governor: they saw then how little sincerity there had been in those soothing promises which the king had made them some years before, when they confinted to the return of the foreign troops. They precived how little trust and confidence he reposed in them. and

Digitized by Google

Book XXIII. and were sensible at last of the truth of what the prince of Orange had so often told them, that, by their agreement with the duke of Parma, they would reduce their country to the miserable state of a province of Spain. The duke d'Arschot and count Charles of Mansveldt, who had reason to expect to have been preferred before Fuentes, would not submit to the indignity put upon them, but resigned their employments, and left the Netherlands. The duke d'Arschot died afterwards in Venice, and count Mansveldt in Hungary, where he commanded the emperor's army against the Turks.

Vigorous conduct of Fuentes. FUENTES in the mean time entered upon the exercise of his office, and notwithstanding the prejudices which the Flemings seem justly to have entertained against him, he soon discovered that his abilities were not unequal to the charge with which he was invested. He applied with great success to quell the mutinous spirit of the army, and in a few months put it upon a much more respectable spotting, both as to discipline and numbers.

Declaration of war between France and Spain.

PHILIP had greater occasion now than ever for abilities and vigour in the person to whom he committed the government of the Netherlands. The League in France was about to expire, notwithstanding his exertions to prevent it; and the French monarch, being firmly seated on his throne, declared war against him, prohibiting all commerce with his subjects, and granting liberty to the French to invade and plunder, and take possession of whatever dominions belonged to the crown of Spain.

Henry's motives.

This measure was condemned by many, as being highly inexpedient at the present juncture, on account of the exhausted state which his kingdom was reduced by the long continuance of the civil civil wars, and no perfect was more feeding of the $1.5% Arreagh of the colemns than the king himle ?; but he believed that, in the present termor of the Cathello king, peace could not be obtained from him apia hosourable terra. He was pentualed that war with the Spaniants mind of medility contique fome time linger; and he mought, mut as nothing would encompaid more to extragally the flames of civil discord than a foreign war, it would be easier to interest his carina's sub-easis in the profecution of it, if it were regarded as a war between the crowns, to which political motives had given birth, than if it were furfered to remain on its prefent footing, and confidered as carried on by Philip for the fake of religion. It is not indeed improbable, that perional animofity added force to there incitements. Philip had ever treated Henry in the most contemptuous manner; and, under the mask of religion, had endeavoured first to exclude him, and afterwards to expel him from the throne. Heavy detefted that artifice and duplicity in Philip's character, of which, in his late attempt to procure the abolition of the Salic law, he had given such incontestable evidence; and the terms in which his declaration of war was expressed, demonstrate, that resentment had, on the present occasion, a considerable influence on his conduct.

PHILIP I SING OF SPAIN

PHILIP's answer to this declaration was perfectly conformable to his character. All his interferences in the affairs of France had proceeded, he faid, from his concern for the prosperity of the people, and the security of the catholic faith; and he declared, that his intention now was not to enter into war with the crown or nation of France, but only to persevere in protecting the true catholics of that kingdom from the oppression of the prince of Bearn and his adherents i D'Avila, lib. xiv.

BOTIL

Book XXIII.

360

1595.

Вотн kings had been employed, before their declaration of war, in preparing for the recommencement of hostilities; and Henry, belides his Protecution domestic preparations, had entered into a treaty of alliance offensive and defensive with the United Provinces. In fulfilment of an article of this treaty. the States sent a body of horse and foot, under Philip count of Nassau, to invade the province of Luxemburg. Their enterprises were for some time attended with success; but Fuentes, having dispatched the brave Verdugo with superior forces to oppose them, they were obliged, after several rencounters, to quit the province; and were foon after recalled, and stationed near the frontier of Brabant, where it was expected they would be of equal fervice to the French monarch, by detaining the Spaniards in the Netherlands.

THE army of the States however, even after it Siege of Cawas joined by these troops, was not able to furnish telet. full employment to those which the governor had prepared. He left an army under Mondragone to check the progress of prince Maurice, and set out himself for Picardy with the rest of his forces. His first enterprise was the siege of Catelet, of which he made himself master in a few weeks, though it was strongly fortified, and bravely defended by the garrison.

Affairs of Comeron liers.

During this siege, Fuentes had reason to flatand d'Orvilter himself with the hopes of acquiring possession of the castle and town of Ham without bloodshed. The castle was held by an officer called d'Orvilliers, and the town by his half-brother, These two men whose name was Gomeron. had been violent partizans of the league, and the latter resolved to deliver the town to the Spaniards rather than to the king of France; but he

PHILIP IL KING OF SPAIN.

361 Book XXIII. 1595.

he demanded from Fuentes a reward of twenty thousand crowns for the town, and a still higher reward, if he should prevail upon his brother (which he engaged to do) to deliver up the castle. The count readily agreed to these terms, and paid him the twenty thousand crowns upon his admitting a thousand Spanish troops into the town; but required Gomeron himself and his two younger brothers to remain with him as hostages, till the castle likewise should be put into his possession. Gomeron consented, from a fond persuasion that his brother would imitate his example, rather than expose bim and his other brothers to the resentment of the Spaniards, especially as their mother was in the castle, whose intreaties he expected d'Orvilliers would be unable to refist. But d'Orvilliers chose rather to abandon his brothers to their fate, than betray his charge to the enemies of his country: and he admitted the duke de Bouillon into the castle. with a numerous body of the king's troops, who attacked the Spaniards in the town, and either put them to the fword or took them prisoners. The mother of Gomeron, now trembling with arxiety for her children's preservation, came to Fuertes and represented, that d'Orvilliers repented of what he had done, and was willing to deliver the call a to him, if he would come himself with his arrest to receive it. The count, believing her representatives to be true, the more readily as the best of former entirely convinced of the truth of it, which is with his forces towards Ham; be fire year on mother had been deceived, 27 d . 20 10 10 10 10 avoid her importunity, a Ori or that the conplace, and religned his government of service, on was inflamed with rage, 2-d 2 . Copyright of the a perhaps deferve to the series a grant series and hands of Fuentes; but it was due to the treachery and egregious folly into which his avarice had betrayed him k.

Book XXIII.

362

Siege of Dourlens.

FROM Ham the count conducted his troops, after they had rested some days, to lay siege to Dourlens. This town being near the frontier of the Netherlands, was strongly fortified and garrifoned by a number of select troops. Still however it was necessary, in order to prevent it from falling into the enemy's hands, that the garrifon should be augmented; and no sooner had the marshals Bouillon and Villars, whom the king had fent to watch the motions of the Spanish army, heard that Dourlens was invested, than they asfembled all the troops in the neighbourhood, amounting to a thousand foot and fifteen hundred horse, and advanced towards the town, in hopes of being able to force their way through the enemy's intrenchments; but Fuentes, having received intelligence of their defign, left a part of his forces to guard his trenches, and marched out with the rest, in order of battle, to an advantageous situation at a little distance from the town. When the duke of Bouillon observed Fuentes so well prepared for his defence, he counselled marshal Villars to retire; but that intrepid general, whose courage was ever too ardent and impetuous, refuled to comply, and still continued to advance, till his troops were almost surrounded by the Spaniards. A desperate and bloody battle ensued; but as there was no proportion in respect of numbers between the contending parties, the French were almost entirely cut to pieces, Villars himself was slain, and the cavalry, after great loss, were obliged to retire.

DURING the combat, the garrifon fallied out upon the troops which had been left to defend the camp and trenches; but through the wife precaution fented, as he dreaded, that if he rejected them, they would be granted by the king of Spain.

3б4 Воок XXIII.

1595.

BALAGNY, being thus confirmed in his possession, spared no expence or pains in strengthening the fortifications of the place. The garrison amounted to three thousand foot and six hundred horse, the greatest part of which were French troops, of the most unquestionable bravery. The town was strong, and it was well furnished with military stores and provisions.

DETERMINED by these considerations, some of the principal officers in the Spanish army endeavoured to persuade the count de Fuentes to relinquish his design, by representing, that before he could accomplish it, either the winter season would overtake him, or the French monarch, being difengaged from his enemies in other quarters, would arrive with a superior army, and attack him after his troops were diminished in number, and exhausted with the operations of the siege; but Fuentes, ambitious to distinguish his administration by fo important an acquisition, and elated by the fuccess with which his enterprises had been hitherto attended, refused to listen to these remonstrances: and, having received a great augmentation of forces from the neighbouring provinces, he began his operations without delay. They were carried on with a degree of skill and vigour which would have reflected honour on the greatest generals of the age; and notwithstanding the most intrepid defence, conducted with much prudence by the celebrated de Vic, whom Henry had sent with a reinforcement of troops to the affiftance of the befieged, he opened his batteries in a few weeks fo near the town, that some of its principal defences were destroyed, and a great part of the wall was laid in ruins. Still however his fuccess was doubtful. He encountered the most-discouraging difficulties culties in furnishing his troops with provisions; Book and nothing but the most unconquerable resolution, added to the dread of tarnishing the glory which he had already acquired, could have prevented 1595. him from abandoning his attempt.

But he was faved from that mortification, by Cambray the inhabitants of the town, who having been long the citizens. accustomed to the mild administration of their archbishops, had borne with extreme impatience the haughty imperious behaviour of Balagny; and had been almost reduced to despair, by the extortion, rapine, and insolence of his wife, by whom he suffered himself to be entirely governed. citizens had fecretly fent a deputation of number to the French monarch, intreating him to deliver them from the yoke of their oppressor, and offering on that condition to submit to his authority, and to receive a garrison of his troops. But through the influence of the famous Gabrielle d'Etrées, whom Balagny had gained over to his interest, Henry not only refused to comply with their request, but confirmed Balagny in his usurped authority.

THE inhabitants, inflamed now with resentment against the king, as well as against Balagny, resolved to embrace the first opportunity of putting themselves under the dominion of their former mafter the king of Spain; and they were confirmed in their resolution, by the numerous ecclesiastics in the town, who hoped by this measure to effectuate the re-establishment of the archbishop, whom Balagny had expelled. Having formed their plan, they delayed the execution of it, till Bilagny and de Vic were wholly occupied in taking measures against an assault, which they believed to be intended by the Spaniards. At that time they ran to arms, and made themselves masters of one oſ 366

XXIII.

1595.

ŧ

BOOK of the gates of the city. De Vic, Balagny, and his wife, spared no pains to divert them from their purpose, but all their endeavours proved ineffectual. Two of the principal citizens were immediately fent to Fuentes, with an offer to furrender the town on the following conditions, to which he readily agreed: That the foldiers should be restrained from plunder: that all past offences should be forgiven: that the citizens should enjoy their wonted privileges, and the archbishop be restored to his ancient jurisdiction and authority.

> THE garrison immediately retired into the citadel, where they expected to have been able to defend themselves for a considerable time. But having found, upon fearching the magazines, that there was hardly provisions enough to support them for three days, they agreed on the first summons to capitulate. The wife of Balagny had reduced them to this necessity, by felling, at an exorbitant price, without her husband's knowledge, the provisions which had been laid up in store.

> During the fiege this woman had discovered a degree of spirit, capacity, and courage above her sex; but being unable to bear the consciousness of that egregious folly into which her avarice had betraved her, and which was now attended with consequences so fatal to her ambition, she was overwhelmed with anguish and despair; and refusing to take either medicine or food, she died miferably, before the citadel was delivered to the Spaniards.

THE capitulation was figned on the feventh of October, and the garrison marched out with all the honours of war upon the ninth; immediately after which, Fuentes having stationed five hundred Spaniards in the citadel, and two thousand Germans in the town, set out for the Netherlands with the rest rest of his forces, and put them into winter- Book quarters in Flanders, Artois, and Hainault 1.

PHILIP H. KING OF SPAIN.

367

THE reader will not suppose that the active spirit Affairs in of the French monarch could be unemployed Burgundy. during the course of these disastrous events. was deeply affected by the loss of the important towns which had been conquered by Fuentes, and would have marched in person to their relief, had he not believed that his presence was still more necessary in another part of his dominions. For Philip having resolved to prosecute the war with vigour in different quarters at the same time, had ordered Velasco, the constable of Castile and governor of Milan, to lead an army of ten thousand men into Burgundy; and these troops, were upon their arrival in Franche Compté, joined by the duke de Mayenne with a thousand foot and four hundred horse. This army was greatly superior to any, which marshal Biron, who commanded in these parts, could affemble to oppose it; and Henry dreaded that the province of Burgundy would be speedily overrun. Having therefore sent orders to his troops in different parts to follow him, he fet out himself at the head of one thousand eight hundred horse and foot, with an intention to harass the enemy, till the rest of his army should. arrive.

THE Spaniards had passed the Saone, and advanced Battle of as far as Fontaine-Françoise, when Henry attacked Françoise. them on their march, with a degree of impetuolity and ardour that filled Velasco with astonishment. The king was bravely supported on this occasion by the marquis de Mirebeau, the count de Gramont, and several others of his nobility; but above all, by the intrepid Biron, who fought long after he was covered with the blood that flowed from Book from a wound which he had received in the beginning of the engagement. The king by his exhortations, and still more by his example, inflamed his troops to a degree of madness. At the head of his squadrons, he plunged sword and hand into the midst of the enemy, broke through their ranks, and threw their van into confusion.

¹ D'Avila, lib. xv. Bentivoglio, part iii. lib. ii-

XXIII. 1595.

> HAD Velasco ordered his whole army to advance, it is impossible but Henry must have been furrounded and overpowered. But his courage on this occasion supplied the want both of caution and of numbers. Velasco intimidated by the unexampled boldness which he had seen displayed, gave orders for a retreat, and left the king in possession of the field of battle. Early next morning he repassed the Saone, notwitestanding the earnest remonstrances of the duke de Mayenne, who had procured certain intelligence of the strength of the enemy. Mayenne then intreated Velasco to leave him a part of the forces to raise the fiege of Dijon, which had been invefted by a party of the royalists, and to enable him to defend fuch other towns on this fide of the river as were still in his possession. But this likewise the Spanish general refused, and continued to retire till he reached the town of Gray; where he fortified his camp in the strongest manner, with a resolution to act only on the defensive, in case the royal army should advance.

Reconcilement of Mayenne with the VELASCO, who was utterly unpractifed in the military art, appears to have been strongly actuated with a dread of the superior skill and bravery of the king. But the duke de Mayenne likewise perceived in his conduct towards bim, on this occasion, manifest symptoms of diffidence and distrust. This the duke could not help attributing Velasco's instruction from the court of Spain: and and he could not doubt, that through the ill offices Book of the Spanish ministers in France, Philip had conceived some fresh jealousy of his designs. He was therefore thrown into great perplexity, while he believed that he should ere long be abandoned by the Spaniards, as he had already been by most of his adherents in France; and could hardly suppose that now, when his power was reduced so low, he would be able to obtain advantageous conditions from the king. After long deliberation, he formed the resolution of going to Madrid, to justify his conduct to Philip, against the misrepresentations But he was faved from that fatal of his ministers. step by the invincible goodness of the French monarch, who, having been informed of his distress, fent Lignerac, a friend and confident of the duke, to assure him of his esteem, and to inform him, that he was still ready to receive him into favour, and to grant him the most honourable terms.

369

1595-

HENRY did not require an immediate submission from him, because the duke had often declared, that he would never acknowledge his authority till the pope should grant him absolution; but he defired that he should retire to Chalons, one of his own towns, and wait there for that event, in full confidence that no advantage should be taken in the mean time either of himself or his adherents.

MAYENNE, who knew with how much fafety he might rely on Henry's promise, and was deeply penetrated with a sense of the generous offer which had been made to him, accepted of it without hefitation, and left the Spanish camp.

Soon after this agreement, Henry advanced to the banks of the Saone, with a resolution to transport his forces, consisting of seven thousand foot and two thousand horse, into Franche Bb Vol. II. Compté, 370

Book Compté, where Velasco lay intrenched. In spite of the troops which had been planted to dispute his passage, he forded the river about three miles below the town of Gray, and then led his army towards the enemy; but finding their intrenchments too strongly fortified to be attacked with any probability of success, he turned aside, and began to lay waste the country, or to levy contributions from the inhabitants. Velasco kept still within his camp. At length the Swiss Cantons, as friends and protectors of the people of Franche Compté, interposed their influence. At their defire, the king readily delifted from his depredations; and having led back his troops into his own dominions, he resolved to march as soon as possible to the frontiers of the Netherlands.

The pope

HE was in daily expectation, at this time, of grants Hen-ry absoluti- receiving the pope's absolution, which had been much longer delayed than he expected, through the violent opposition of the Spanish ministers at Rome; but Clement now perceiving, that Henry was firmly established on the throne, and dreading, that by a longer delay he might exhauft his patience, and provoke him to throw off his allegiance to the Holy See, in imitation of Henry VIII. of England, in the pontificate of Clement VII. he resolved to run the risk of giving offence to Philip, and on the 16th of September pronounced the sentence of absolution. This event inexpressible joy to all the true catholics of France: and the treaty of agreement, which had been begun with the duke de Mayenne, was soon after brought to the defired conclusion. members of the League as had not already fubmitted, imitated the example of their leader. ternal peace was every where established, Henry had leifure to apply his whole attention to the Spanish war m.

> Тнв m D'Avila, lib. xiv. Thuanus, anno 1595. Perefixe Elzevir, p. 230, &c.

> > Digitized by Google

THE transactions in the Netherlands this year Book were less important and interesting than in any former campaign fince the commencement of the war, which was principally owing to the gover- Affairs of nor's prudent choice of the vigilant, experienced the Nether-Mondragone, as commander in chief of the forces during his absence. About the middle of July, prince Maurice besieged the town of Groll; but Mondragone, having augmented his army, by making draughts from the garrifons of the neighbouring towns, advanced towards him with fo much celerity, that not having had time to complete his entrenchments, Maurice was obliged to raise the siege. The two armies lawlong in sight of each other; and as they were nearly equal in strength, and both generals exerted an equal degree of vigilance and circumspection, they effectually prevented one another from undertaking any important enterprise.

XXIII.

THERE were frequent skirmishes with various fuccess: but the only one which deserves to be mentioned was a rencounter near the river Lippe, where Maurice ordered count Philip de Nassau, with five hundred horse, to lie in ambush in a wood, to intercept a party of the enemy which had been sent out for provisions. Of this Mondragone had received intelligence, and with great secrecy stationed a body of horse still more numerous in another wood at a little distance from the first. When the Spanish foragers arrived at the ambuscade, they were attacked on every fide, and repulled with confiderable flaughter; but being speedily reinforced by their friends in the neighbouring woods, they returned to the charge. The Dutch troops, aftonished to find themselves caught in their own snare, were at last overpowered by numbers; three hundred of them, with their commander, were killed, and the rest obliged to save themselves by flight.

HISTORY OF THE REIGN, &c.

372 Book XXIII.

1595. Death of Mondragone. This was the last memorable event of the campaign, although the two generals remained in fight of each other till the end of October, when they broke up their camps, and put their troops into winter-quarters; and Mondragone died not long after at the age of ninety-two, having to the last preserved sufficient vigour to suffil, with distinguished reputation, all the duties of a commander. He had served in the Netherlands near fifty years, and had a principal share in almost every military enterprise, yet he had the singular fortune to escape without a wound a.

n Grotius, lib. iv. Bentivoglio, part iii. lib. ii.

During the course of the transactions recorded in this book, the Dutch performed their first expedition to India; but as their acquisitions at this time were inconsiderable, and their most important conquests over Philip's subjects in that distant region were not atchieved till several years after the present period, I have reserved the relation of the whole for the history of the subsequent reign.

HISTORY

OF THE REIGN OF

PHILIP THE SECOND

KING OF SPAIN

B O O K XXIV.

ROM the capacity and vigour, of which the Book count de Fuentes had given so many proofs XXIV. fince his accession to the government, there was reason to expect, that he would have been suffered The archlong to retain possession of it; but Philip, having duke Albert from the beginning intended that he should con-the Nethertinue governor only for one year, had immediately lands. after the death of Ernest fixed upon the cardinal archduke Albert for his fuccessor.

This prince, nephew to Philip, and youngest brother to the emperor, had been entrusted with the regency of Portugal. By his prudent administration he had acquired universal esteem; and Philip, who entertained the highest opinion of his abilities, believed that no person was better qualified, either to prosecute the war with vigour, or to bring it to the defired conclusion.

y in time to divide the fprille attle of Turnbent, through the great diftween the numbers of the flain on the ops, contributed more to evalt the climictitize that any of he former archive-Nor was it military renows only which has by gave a floking proof they be of his in his treatment of the prilosers, whom ed from all i jury and virte as with the re, and many of them recovered through attention which he beflowed. He with of const Varie to the confident and that occasion afford Forn, that he would to remain example, and take offerend to reach all cruelty and courage in the statistical of the war ".

is which Albert followed in the family of the na forestrevente compressed to the of Armens, the copied of Premiss and fluored and seed of the only, and fluored and the copied of the parties of the Language had been followed to the n conduce, that it they recent priviid by premoved, and it premoved, that d he allowed to restable town them-benefit by obligad to adore a gazones of uniter of about wise were to within his roding tion was between denotes a and little Their other their deep mornes their simy what to the darger to what they put to greater maghifunctional and the Sp -- gar the fame amorning to their isopations as in the time of peace a cuty proper thought Thomself of the first part of the second ed it conducted, and, after about a their counter had taben, they had arms, and forfered the thems to take the los a.

Digitized by Google

vs. of this differ affected the Propelement at. the most realithe macater, and greate to my which has late triumphriver that calculated to existe. To confidered a note were, before this time, we note have not of the principal was proved in a good that by their perfect compacts of a public from the Newschools, by could make been home on the partie He was mornifold by teller to goon. t which Torongo portions mand force of one glory condited cloudy to ve tones. a low own tolky sty, studdle sky whole response to the Logiston ringht to kendpro-propert calcorder, and name the a complot in discontinuous but hear. ... fain, and our out amuscless is the a Somme h where, also permittee ribal Binovaint from miles principal of aveil to poly occurry want that the in three reagues higher than America.

d by Google

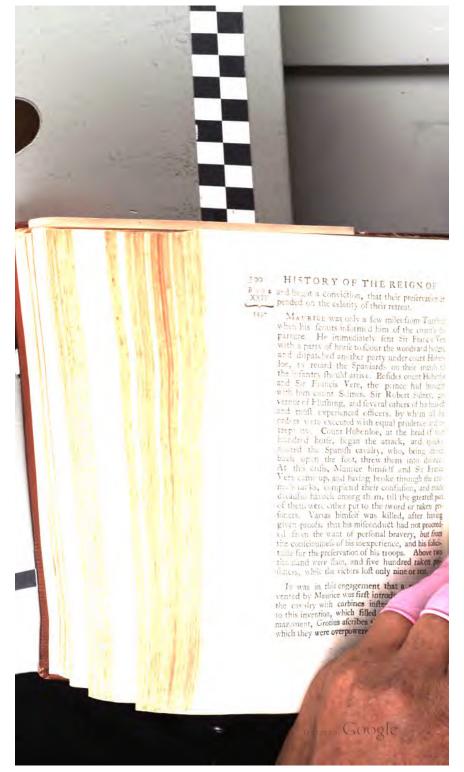

100 HISTORY OF THE REIGN OF Bross and by a convection, that their prefervation de XXIV pended on the celegity of their retreat.

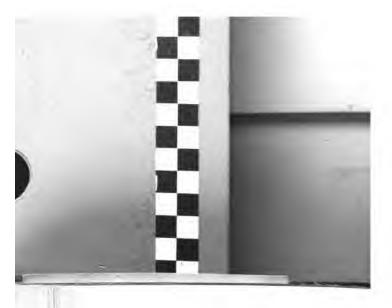

1557 Macrier was only a few miles from Tambour when his feauts informed him of the count's departure. He immediately fent Sir Francis Vere with a purry of horic to fener the woods and hedges, and disputched on other party under count Hobenloc. to retard the Spannirds on their march till the infinity the old arrive. Belides count Helienloe and Sir Linicis Vere, the poince had brought with him count Sciences, Sir Robert Sidney, goversion of Plathing, and leveral others of his braveft and most experienced adicers, by whem all his orders were executed with equal prudence and in-Count Hohenloe, at the head of four Trept Byburdend houte, began the attack, and quickly mined the Spanish casalty, who, being driven back upon the foot, threw them into dilorder. At this cutto, Nanuce himfelt and Sir Francis Very came up, and having broke through the encme no los comported their container, and rande distable bassels among thems till the greated parof them were cuber por to the tword or taken pripart profes that he misconduct had not proceed ad item the west of perional bravery, but from the conferences of his mesperience, and his falicithe for the prefervation of he troup. Above two and their the riet pulled only naw or ten-

It was in this engagement that a practice is exactly in Manage visited introduced, of arming the order with write carbines indead of lances and the invention, which filled the memy with account also less the great facility with bely they were everpowered; for the victory was greated.

100 HISTORY OF THE REIGN OF

Book and to be a conviction, that their prefervation de XXIV, pended on the celents of their retreat.

1507

MAURICE was only a few miles from Turnhout when his feores informed him of the count's de-He immediately fent Sir Francis Vere with a purity of brute to femu the woods and hedges, and dispatched another perty under count Hoberloc, in retard the Spariands on their march tall the infantry fliends army. Befides count Hohenlae and Sor Francis Vere, the prince had brought with him count Salmes, Sir Robert Salmes, goversor of Hothings, and feveral others of his braveft and most experienced officers, by whem all his only were excepted with equal printence and inarepoins. Count libertoe, at the head of four bundled hors, began the attack, and quickly count the Sponth cavalry, who, being driven that, upon the foot, threw them into ditorder At this criffs, Manage huntelf and Sir Francis Vin some up, and having broke through the one me's tacks, completed their confution, and made Uniana barrel, among them, till the greatest parof the saver cubes put to the tword or taken prithe Varias bantell was killed, after laying 100 to prouds, that his mifconduct had not proceed of their the want of perional bravery, but from a contenuation his mexperience, and he fatherby the preference of his troops. Above two is a up that the view to half only nine or ten.

I was in this congression that a practice in that the Mander was first immediated, of arming the other with carbons instead of lances; and the assertion which filled the comme with unique the comme aim to the great facility with built to were everpowered, for the victory was rather to the processing the contract of t

The Control of LHp Eritex Of

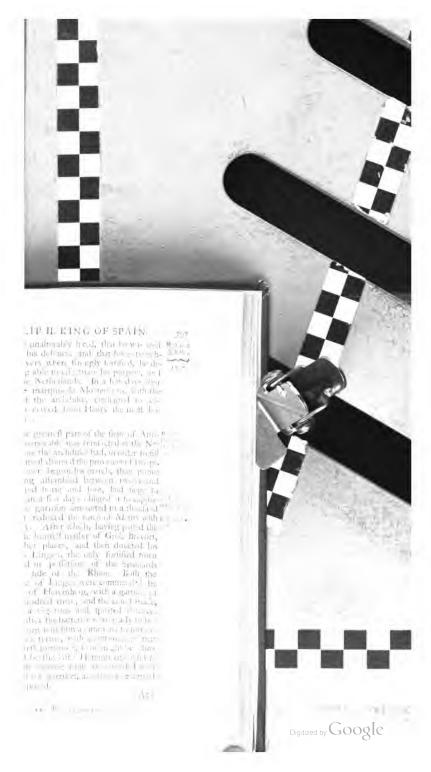

(1) Xr (Fley), (1) (1) (2) (2) (2) (2) (2)

Exposed by converse to the content of the content o

the trape is confiderably and from the whall the king had brought yith how. If the contact the English towers, the fing was count on with reftrength against the confederated provinces. They were not without suspicions likewise, that the queen of England would embrace the present opportunity of delivering herself from the Spanish war, and were therefore much disquieted with the apprehensions of being left without an ally to support them. But they were soon delivered from their sears with regard to the conduct of Elizabeth, who being entirely convinced that the interest and safety of their infant republic were inseparable from her own, gave them fresh assurances of the continuance of her friendship.

Book XXIV.

THE French monarch no fooner agreed to the pope's proposal of a congress, than he sent an intimation of it to his allies, and expressed his desire, that, if possible, a general peace might be established, in which they, as well as himself, might be comprehended. But neither Elizabeth nor the States were disposed to listen to his advice. latter were well affured that no confideration would persuade Philip to treat with them as a free state. and they were unalterably determined never to acknowledge him as their fovereign. who had on different occasions experienced the great advantage which she derived from alliance with them, was no less solicitous than themselves that they should maintain their independence; and she believed, that while they maintained it, she fhould have no great reason to dread the power of Philip. She was concerned however at the profpect of losing so useful an ally as the king of France, and fent Sir Robert Cecil and Mr. Herbert. who were accompanied by Justin de Nassau and the celebrated Barnevelt, from the States, to remonstrate with Henry against the peace.

These able negociators left no argument untouched that could dissuade him from his purpose: they reminded him of the alliance into which he had had lately entered with the queen and the States, Book and of the affiftance which on different occasions XXIV. they had afforded him. They represented the danger to which he exposed himself by treating with a prince who had given so many striking proofs of infincerity; and they offered to furnish him with a large supply of forces, believes money, and a numerous fleet, for the recovery of Calais, and the farther profecution of the war.

1598.

HENRY replied, that no alliance which he had formed with the queen or the States, could be reasonably interpreted as an obligation on him uncessarily to prolong the war, which he was perfuaded would foon prove the utter ruin of his kingdom. He expressed in strong terms his gratitude for the friendship which they had shewn him, and assured them, that no peace which he should conclude with Spain, would prevent him from making a fuitable return. From the manner of life to which he had been fo long inured, joined to the provocations which he had received from Philip, they might believe, that it was not an aversion to the war, but the necessity of peace that had determined him to embrace a measure fo repugnant to the inclination of his friends. The disorders which prevailed in his dominions were such, that if the proper remedies were not applied, they would foon become incurable, and these remedies could not be applied in the time of war; but peace, he hoped, would quickly reftore his kingdom to its native strength and vigour; when, instead of being a burden upon his allies, as he had hitherto been, he would be able, and they should find him willing, not only to repay with interest the obligations which they had laid him under, but to defend and protect them, and the rest of Europe, against the exorbitant ambition of the king of Spain.

THIS Vol. II. Ðd

HISTORY OF THE REIGN OF

Book XXIV. 1598.

402

This apology, delivered with that irrefiltible force of natural eloquence, by which Henry was eminently diftinguished, made a strong impression upon the minds of the English and Dutch ambasfadors; they could not doubt of the truth of what they had heard; and before their departure, they had the candour to acknowledge, that as the peace which he was about to conclude was necessary for France, so it might be found in the issue highly beneficial to the other European powers. Henry sent ambassadors to England and Holland to enforce what he had faid on this occasion, and still continued as formerly on terms of cordial friendship both with Elizabeth and the States.

THE treaty of peace was foon after brought to Conclusion of the peace on the 2d of the defired conclusion 1. Several difficulties occur-May. red during the course of the conferences, which were removed through the difinterested zeal and great authority of the pope and the cardinal legate, and at length, upon Henry's resigning his claim to Cambray, Philip consented, though with great reluctance, to give up Calais, Andres, Dourlens, and all the other towns in France, which he had acquired at the expence of so much blood and Philip transfers the Ne-Albert.

PHILIP had been the more folicitous to put an therlands to end to the war, on account of a scheme which he liabella and had conceived, after the disappointment of his views in France, of transferring the sovereignty of the Netherlands to his eldest daughter Isabella, whom he intended to give in marriage to the archduke. And to embrace this measure, he was prompted, partly by treasure ...

1 At Vervins.

m Bentivoglio, part. iii. lib. iv. p. 464. Sully, lib. ix. D'Avila, towards the conclusion. Thuanus, lib. cxx. sect. i. and v; and Camden, p. 760, &c. Miniana, lib. x. cap. xii.

by his affection for the Infanta, one of the most accomplished women of the age, and partly by his esteem for Albert, whom, of all the princes in Europe, he deemed the most worthy of so illustrious an alliance.

Book XXIV.

1598.

Bur while his attachment to his daughter and His deliberher future husband made him desirous of procur-this subject. ing for them some sovereign establishment, he could not, without reluctance, resolve to separate from the body of his empire so rich a portion of his hereditary dominions. To the troops and money of the Netherlands, the late emperor and himself had been greatly indebted for most of their victories over their enemies in France and Germany; and it had been the Netherlands chiefly, which, by their situation in the heart of Europe, had rendered them formidable to the several European powers, and enabled them so long to maintain the tranquillity of their other dominions. The preservation indeed of these provinces had, for many years, proved a perpetual drain for the wealth of the Spanish monarchy; but it was doubtful whether, if they were disjoined from it, they would not be found as great a burden as ever, fince it would still be incumbent on the king to support the archduke in his new fovereignty, against the attempts of his enemies in the revolted provinces.

THESE confiderations were urged with great warmth by the count de Fuentes, in order to diffuade Philip from the profecution of his design. But some others of his counsellors, and particularly the count de Castel-Rodrigo, in whom he reposed the greatest confidence, were at no less pains to confirm him in it, by representing, that the separation proposed, instead of lessening, would serve to augment the strength and vigour of the Spanish monarchy.

" THE

F-1

"THE Netherlands lay to remote from the feat of government, and the laws of that country, and the anguage, character, and manners of the peopie, were in extremely different from those of Span, that it would be for ever found impracticabe to preserve them in obedience. Their aversion to a foreign dominion, and especially that of Spain, was infurmountable; the absence and distance of the king had been the cause of that inveterate rebelien which had furnished employment to his armies for almost forty years, and no other effectual means could be devited either to reconcile the provinces which had already revolted, or to prevent the rest from imitating their example, but to give them a fovereign of their own, who by reliding among them, might conciliate and secure their affections. It was true, that without the affiftance of the queen of England, the rebels must long ere now have laid down their arms; but if with the feeble aid which they had received from a queen engroffed with domestic cares, and tottering on her throne, they had been able for fo many years not only to defend themselves, but to carry on an offenfive fuccelsful war, how much reason was there to dread the consequences that must follow, if the British crowns were united, as they would foon be, on the head of a prince in the vigour of life, who being free from the embarrassments of a disputed title, would have full leifure to give attention to foreign affairs. From jealousy of the king, the neighbouring princes would never cease to support the rebellion, and foment the difcontents of his Flemish subjects; but if the Netherlands were distunited from the Spanish monarchy, and erected into a separate and independent state, the cause of that jealousy would be removed; it would become the interest of France and Britain, and the other neighbouring powers, to lead their assistance to extinguish the war; and even the the revolted provinces would, in order to fecure Book XXIV. internal tranquillity, chuse to return to their antient union with the Southern provinces."

By these arguments, which coincided with Phi-His deed of lip's inclination, he was confirmed in his design; abdiestion, and on the 6th of May he signed the deed of abdication; in which, after declaring his resolution to give the Infanta in marriage to the archduke, he resigned the sovereignty of the Netherlands, and of the county of Burgundy, to that princess, to be enjoyed conjunctly by her and her future husband, and after their decease, by the heirs of the marriage, whether male or semale, according to the established rules of hereditary succession.

Bur it was provided, that in case this sovereignty should devolve to a female, she should marry either the king or the prince of Spain. That neither any prince nor princess descended from the Infanta, should marry without the consent of the king of Spain; and that in default of issue, the Netherlands should be re-united to the Spanish monarchy, By other articles, it was stipulated that the new sovereigns should prevent their subjects from trading to the Indies; that they should, before their admission, take an oath to permit the exercise of no other religion but the catholic, within their dominions; and in case they should fail in the execution of this, or any other article, it was declared that the fovereignty transferred should immediately return to the crown of Spain.

This deed was immediately transmitted to Hewere electronic the archduke; and soon afterwards the States of red in the Neuherlands. the southern provinces agreed to accept of the archduke and the Infanta for their sovereigns, with the conditions which the deed contained; being well pleased to be delivered, as they

HISTORY OF THE REIGN OF

Book they expected to be, from the yoke of Spain, XXIV. which they had found fo grievous and intolerable.

1598.

406

Bur although this event gave great satisfaction to the people subject to the Spanish government, it was not likely to produce any change in the fentiments, or conduct of their neighbours in the United Provinces. The new fovereigns, faid the confederates, whom Philip has appointed, will be fovereigns in name only and appearance, but not in reality. They will be utterly unable to support themselves without the assistance of the Spanish arms. They will depend on Spain as much as any Spanish governor or regent; and the Spaniards will still continue to exercise, as formerly, an unlimited influence in the government. In the deed of abdication, the Netherlands are treated, not as a free and independent State, but as a fief of the Spanish monarchy; and from the advanced age of the Infanta m, together with the conditions of the deed of abdication, it was evident that the present measure could be meant only as a temporary expedient, intended to amuse the people of the southern provinces, and not as a fixt and permanent establishment. But whatever was the king's intention in this measure, and whether the sovereignty now transferred, should or should not return to the crown of Spain, it was the unalterable resolution of the United Provinces to maintain their liberty, in opposition to whatever attempts might be made to deprive them of it by the king of Spain, or the archduke of Austria n.

ALBERT was in the mean time employed in preparing to set out for Madrid; but having been detained in the Low Countries much longer than he expected, by a new mutiny of his troops, he m Thirty-two.

[&]quot; Van Meteren, Grotius, &c-

PHILIP II. KING OF SPAIN.

407. 8 0 0 7

he had begun his journey when he received intelligence of the death of the king.

1598.

For more than two years this prince had been 1598. extremely afflicted with the gout; to which had death of been lately added, a hectic fever, and a dropfy. Finding his strength so much decayed, that he could not expect to live above a few weeks, he ordered his attendants to transport him from Madrid to the Escurial; and when his physicians signified to him their apprehensions, that he would not be able to endure the fatigue: " but I am refolved, he answered, to accompany my funeral to my tomb." Upon his arrival at the Escurial, the gout returned with redoubled violence, both in his feet and hands; and foon afterwards, several imposthumes gathered in his knees and breast, which occasioned the most excruciating pain. He was in fome measure relieved by laying the imposthumes open. But another more intolerable diftress suc-The matter of his fores was of the most purulent and nauseous nature, and swarms of lice were engendered in it, from which no application and no care or pains could deliver him. In this dreadful condition, he lay in a supine posture, for more than fifty days; during which time he exhibited a striking display of patience, firmness of mind, and refignation to his fate. He gave proof of the fincerity of his religious profession, by practifing with great zeal and affiduity, those superstitious observances, which the church of Rome prescribes, as the means of procuring acceptance with the Deity. He seemed inclined likewise to make atonement for some severities which he had exercifed, and ordered feveral prisoners to be released, and their effects restored ".

ABOUT

[·] Among these was the wife of Antonio Perez.

408

XXIV. 1598. Abour two tlays before his death, having fent for his son, and his daughter sabella, he discoursed to them of the vanity of human greatness, delivered many salutary counsels for the administration of their dominions, and exhorted them with much earnestness to cultivate and maintain the catholic faith. When they had lest him, he gave directions for his funeral; and ordered his coffin to be brought into his chamber, and placed within his view; soon after which his speech sailed, and he expired on the 13th of September, in the seventy-second year of his age, and the forty-third of his reign?

His charseter.

No character was ever drawn by different historians in more opposite colours than that of Philip; and yet, confidering the length and activity of his reign, there is none which it should seem would be more easy to ascertain. From the facts recorded in the preceding history, we cannot doubt that he possessed in an eminent degree, penetration, vigilance, and a capacity for government. eyes were continually open upon every part of his extensive dominions. He entered into every branch of administration: watched over the conduct of his ministers with unwearied attention; and in his choice both of them and of his generals, discovered a confiderable share of sagacity. He had at all times a composed and settled countenance, and never appeared to be either elated or depreffed. His temper was the most imperious, and his looks and demeanour were haughty and fevere; yet among his Spanish subjects, he was of easy access: listened patiently to their representations and complaints; and where his ambition and bigotry did not interfere, was generally willing to redress their When we have faid thus much in his praise, we have said all that justice requires, or truth truth permits. It is indeed impossible to suppose Book that he was infincere in his zeal for religion. But as his religion was of the most corrupt kind, it served to increase the natural depravity of his disposition; and not only allowed, but even prompted him to commit the most odious and shocking crimes. Although a prince in the bigoted age of Philip might be persuaded, that the interest of religion would be advanced by falsehood and persecution; yet it might be expected, that, in a virtuous prince, the fentiments of honour and humanity would, on some occasions, triumph over the dictates of fuperstition; but of this triumph, there occurs not a fingle instance in the reign of Philip; who, without hesitation, violated his most sacred obligations as often as religion afforded him a pretence; and under that pretence exercised for many years the most unrelenting cruelty, without reluctance or remorfe. His ambition, which was exorbitant; his refentment, which was implacable; his arbitrary temper, which would fubmit to no controul; concurred with his bigoted zeal for the catholic religion, and carried the languinary spirit, which that religion was calculated to inspire, to a greater height in Philip, than it ever attained in any other prince of that, or of any former or succeeding age.

P Miniana, lib. x. cap. xiv. Thuanus, lib. cxx. fect. xiv.

409

XXIV. 1598.

Some historians have distinguished this prince by the title of Philip the prudent, and have reprefented him as the wifest, as well as the most religious prince, that ever filled the Spanish throne, But it is questionable, whether he be entitled to praise on account of his prudence, any more than on account of his religion. In the beginning of his reign, he discovered great caution in his military enterprises; and on some occasions, made even Bldifcreto.

1598.

Book even greater preparations than were necessary to XXIV. insure success. But his ambition, his resentment, and his abhorrence of the protestants were too violent to fuffer him to act conformably to the dictates of found policy and prudence. He might have prevented the revolt of his Dutch and Flemish fubjects, if, after the reformation in the Netherlands was suppressed by the dutchess of Parma, he had left the reins of government in the hands of that wife princess, and had not sent so odious a tyrant as the duke of Alva to enflave them. might, after the defeat of the prince of Orange, have rivetted the chains of flavery about their necks, and gradually accustomed them to the yoke; if by engaging in too many expensive enterprises, he had not exhausted his excliequer, and made it in some measure necessary for Alva to impole the taxes of the tenth and twentieth pennies for the maintenance of his troops. He might, through the great abilities of the duke of Parma, have again reduced the revolted provinces to obedience, if he had not conceived the wild ambition of fubduing England, and acquiring the fovereignty of France. His armies in the latter part of his reign were never sufficiently numerous to execute the various enterprises which he undertook; yet they were much more numerous than he was able to support. Few years passed in which they did not mutiny for want of pay. And Philip suffered greater prejudice from the disorders and devastation which his own troops committed, than he ever received from the arms of his enemies. his attempts on England and France, his wifest counsellors remonstrated in the strongest terms. And prudence certainly required that, previously to any attack upon the dominions of others, he should have secured possession of his own. so great was his illusion, that rather than delay the execution of those schemes which his resentment and ambition had fuggefted, he chose to run the risk of losing the fruits of all the victories Book which the duke of Parma had obtained; and having left defenceless the provinces which had submitted to his authority, he thereby afforded an opportunity to the revolted provinces, of establishing their power, on so firm a foundation, as the whole strength of the Spanish monarchy, exerted against them for more than fifty years. was unable to overturn .

PHILIP IL KING OF SPAIN.

411 XXIV.

1 çq8.

s If the reader incline to enter more particularly into the private life and character of Philip, than has been thought proper in the general history of his reign, he will meet with feveral interesting anecdotes, in the prince of Orange's Apology, of which an abstract is subjoined.

APPEN.

APPENDIX;

CONTAINING

AN ABSTRACT

OF THE

APOLOGY OR VINDICATION

OF THE

PRINCE OF ORANGE,

AGAINST

PHILIPS PROSCRIPTION.

APPENDIX.

THE prince of Orange begins his Apology, APPENwhich is addressed to the confederated States with observing, that being conscious of having devoted his life and fortune to the service of the Netherlands, it afforded him great joy to reflect upon the testimony given to his fidelity and zeal, in that barbarous Proscription which had been published against him by the king of Spain. "I have reason likewise," continued he, " to rejoice at the opportunity which is thus presented to me, to vindicate my conduct from those malignant imputations, which have been cast upon it by certain ignoble hirelings; and which are repeated and fet forth in the blackest colours in this Proscription. For I am not accused at this time by any of those oblime libellers, to whom I have ever thought it beneath my dignity to reply; but by a great and powerful prince, who intends, through my fiden, to would, and if possible to destroy, the confederacy. I can will confidence appeal to you, who are well acquained with my past life, whether it has ever been my post tice, either to praise myself or to censure others. And I must likewise appeal to you and to the world, whether now, when I am accused of inquationic, infidelity, and hypocrify, compared to a Judan and a Cain, called a rebel, a matter, a difficilies of the public peace, and an enemy to mankind, and when both pecuniary and humany rewards are promised to those who shall slay or murder me; whether after this, the duty which I owe to myself, and to you who have reposed in me such unlimited confidence, does not call upon me to say what I can confistently with truth, to prove the malice and falsehood of my accuser? If you know his representation of my conduct to be just, you will shut your ears against the defence which I am about to offer; but if you have known me from my youth to be more faithful, and chafte, and virtuous, than the author of this infamous Proscription, I shall expect that you will attend favourably to what I shall advance, and deliver judgment in vindication of my integrity and innocence.

1580.

> "THE first crime of which I am accused in this Proscription, is ingratitude; and a recital is made of favours bestowed on me by the king himfelf, and the emperor his father; to the latter of whom, it is faid, I owed my succession to the late Prince of Orange; and to the former, my having been admitted into the order of the Golden Fleece. and appointed a counsellor of state, and governor of the provinces of Holland, Zealand, Utrecht. and Burgundy.

> " No man respects more than I do the memory of the emperor, and I reflect with much satisfaction on the many proofs of attachment which I received from him. But the necessity which I am laid under to vindicate my character, obliges me to observe, that of the fort of favours which are objected to me, I never received any from the emperor, but on the contrary suffered great loss and prejudice in his service. With respect to my succession to the inheritancee queathed to me by my cousin, the late prince of Orange, it is impossible to conceive any ground for alleging that I was at all indebted for it to the emperor. My right to that inheritance was indiffutable; nor was there APPENever any prince or private person, who pretended to call in question its validity. Would not the emperor have been justly accused of tyranny and injustice, if he had prevented me from enjoying it? And does my accuser reckon it an instance of goodness in a prince, merely not to defraud and oppress his faithful subjects?

1580.

"ALL Europe knows what important services the emperor received from the prince my kinfman; who commanded his armies, extended his dominions, and died at his feet. Had the emperor employed his power to disappoint the last will of one who had served him with so much fidelity and fuccess, would be not have involved his name in perpetual infamy? Besides, that even although he had inclined to act a part so unworthy of his character, yet of the most valuable part of that inheritance he could not have deprived me, as it lies within the territory of the king of France, on whom alone I depend for the secure possession of it. But even allowing that what is faid of my obligations to the emperor were true, yet the king of Spain is furely not intitled to reproach me with it; who in contempt of all law and justice, has, to the utmost of his power, endeavoured to deprive me of the inheritance in question, and rendered ineffectual that kindness of the emperor, for my unmindfulness of which he accuses me of ingratitude.

"GRATITUDE, in the opinion of this prince, ought not to be confined to the person by whom favours have been bestowed, but ought to extend likewise to his descendants; and it is because I have opposed the son, whose father was my benefactor, that I am deemed ungrateful. Let him apply this golden rule to his own conduct, as he has applied it to mine; and he will then perceive which Vol. II.

1580.

APPEN- which of us is guilty of ingratitude. Maximilian was the first of the family of Austria, who came into the Netherlands. And no person acquainted with history is ignorant of the important obligations which that emperor received from my kinfman count Egelbert of Nassau; by whom he was powerfully supported against Lewis the eleventh of France; by whom the people who had rebelled against him were subdued; and by whom likewise he recovered his liberty, of which the jealoufy of the Flemings had deprived him. Need I mention what every body knows, of the service performed to the late emperor Charles, by count Henry of Nassau my uncle, who was in reality the person that prevailed with the electors to confer upon him the Imperial crown? Was it not by the bravery of René, prince of Orange, that the emperor subdued the dutchy of Guelderland; and by that of Philibert, that he gained possession of Lombardy and Naples, and the person of the pope, and the city and state of Rome? And will his son pretend to reproach the memory of these great men, by boasting of his father's kindness, in suffering justice to be done to their kinsman? Am I not authorised from the few facts which I have mentioned, to affert, that had it not been for the houses of Orange and Nassau, which I have the honour to represent, my defamer could not have put so many pompous titles, as are inserted in the beginning of his proscription?

"By what I have faid, I would not be understood to disclaim every kind of obligation to the empe-I shall for ever retain a grateful remembrance of the honour which he did me, when after having taken upon himself the inspection of my education, and kept me nine years about his person, he gave me the important charge of all his ordnance in the Netherlands; and in my absence, without any application made in my behalf, in contradiction

DIX.

tradiction to the representations of his courtiers, and in preference to many officers of great experience, appointed me commander in chief of his army, at the age of twenty-one. I reflect with gratitude on that testimony of regard, with which he honoured me at the time of his relignation, when having fent for me from the camp, he gave me a public proof of his affection, by placing me next him, and leaning upon me, to support himfelf under the fatigue of that folemnity. I know likewise, that he meant to give me a further proof of his regard, when he imposed upon me the irksome task of carrying the Imperial crown to his brother Ferdinand. But will my enemies pretend to affert, either that I shewed myself unworthy of these honours, or that my interest and fortune were promoted by them? Did the troops, when I commanded them, suffer any repulse or damage? On the contrary, although the plague raged among them, and I had two of the ablest generals of the age, the duke de Nevers, and the admiral Coligny, for my opponents; I kept them at bay, and fortified the towns of Charlemont and Philipville, in ipite of their most vigorous endeavours to prevent me. While the services which I performed correiponded to the trust reposed in me, I can affirm with truth, that honour was the only acquisition which I derived from the favour that was shewn me. From the chamber of accounts it will appear that I never received any pecuniary recompence for my services. I am able to prove by the most incontestible evidence, that my unavoidable ex-Dence as general, added to the expence of my embassy into Germany, and that which I incurred. when the king required me to receive and entertain the numerous foreign nobility, who crouded to congratulate him on his accession, amounted to no less than one million five hundred thousand floring And to indemnify me for this expence, what return did I receive from the king, who now are Ee 2

Digitized by Google

ror's consent, begun to affert my claim to the lordfhip of Chatel Bellin, before the supreme count of justice at Mechlin; when the counsellors had registered their opinion, and on the day when they were to have pronounced sentence in my favour, this king, who had just sworn to govern us according to the laws, did, in violation of these laws, interpose his arbitrary power, and forbid the judges to proceed; nor since that time, have they been ever permitted to do me justice.

"WHEN what I have faid shall be confidered. the governments which were bestowed on me, will not appear to be more than was due for the fervices which I have performed; nor more than an adequate compensation for that extraordinary expence, which these services had cost me. Had the king allowed me to remain in possession of these governments, he might have had some reafon for reproaching me; although it was not in reality to him I was indebted for them, but to the emperor, by whom it was determined they should be conferred upon me, before his departure from the Netherlands. But fince my accuser has laboured to expel me from them; fince he has, to the utmost of his power, deprived me of my posfessions, besides carrying off my son to Spain, in contempt of the privileges of this country, which he had sworn to preserve inviolate, because I would not lend myself a willing instrument of his oppresfion; after this, I say, is he intitled to accuse me of ingratitude?

"Nor is there any better ground for his accufation, that I have violated the allegiance, which I owed him as my fovereign. Though I have rejected his authority, yet I have done nothing more than was done by his ancestor, Albert duke of Austria, the founder of his family, against my ancestor.

1;80.

ancestor, the emperor Adolphus of Nassau. And APPRINbelides this, I should gladly know by what title my accuser possesses his Castilian dominions? Did not his predecessor Henry of Castile, a bastard, rise in rebellion against his brother Pedro, his lawful fovereign, whom he killed with his own hand? And is not Philip the lineal heir of that usurper? It may be faid, that Pedro was a tyrant, and therefore justly dethroned and flain. And may not the fame plea be offered in excuse for the part which I have acted? May it not be faid with truth of Philip, that his conduct has been that of a cruel tyrant; and that the cruelties exercised by Pedro, were much less shocking and horrible, than those which have been perpetrated by the duke of Alva and his Associates? I must farther observe, that as king of Spain, I owe him no submission, but only as duke of Brabant. And as he is duke of that province, I, by reason of the baronies which I hold there, am one of the principal members of it. But he has forgotten the conditions on which he received this dukedom. He has forgotten the solemn oath which he took to preserve our privileges; and that it is an express article of the compact betwixt us, that if he fail in his engagements, our obligation to obey him as our fovereign shall cease. All Europe has witneffed his open contempt of these engagements. All Europe will bear me witness. when I say, that not a single privilege only, but every privilege of which we boasted, and which he had sworn to maintain, has been violated; and not in a fingle instance only, but in a thoufand instances. In my own person, as I have already hinted, I have had ample experience of his lawless tyranny: my son, at an age when he was incapable of offending him, has been torn from me. All my estates and goods have been confiscated; and I myself declared a traitor and rebel, without any of those forms of trial which APPEN- which the laws require; and by whom? By men of the lowest class vested with his authority, by pettifoggers, and others too mean to be employed as pages, by one who holds the rank, which I have long held in the Netherlands. I do not deny, that at his accession I took the customary oath of Allegiance; but the tie on me to yield obedience, and that on him to afford protection, were mutual, and it is a dictate of common fense, that in obligations of this fort, the failure of either party fets the other free from his engagements.

> " Bur even if I had not received any personal injury, I should have thought myself indispensably obliged to oppose the tyrannical measures which were purfued. For it is not the prince only who fwears to maintain the fundamental laws. fame oath is required of the nobles, and of all who are admitted into public employments. By this oath I was flrictly bound to do every thing in my power to rescue my fellow citizens from the oppressions under which they groaned, and, had I not done what my enemy complains of, I should have been justly chargeable with the crime, of which all the world knows that he has been guilty, a breach of the most facred and solemn obligation.

> "To this imputation, I know that his partifans are ready to reply, that although he swore at his accession to maintain our privileges, yet the pope had granted him a dispensation from his oath. leave it to divines and others, better acquainted than I am with religious controversies, to determine whether this arrogance of the pope, in assuming power to let men free from the obligation of an oath, be not an impious encroachment on the prerogative of Heaven, and I leave it to them to determine, whether this pretention is not destructive of faith among men, and subversive of society. I speak not therefore of the lawfulness of Philip's con- APPEN-duct, after having obtained this boafted dispenfation, but of his folly in applying for it. The tie between him and his subjects was strictly mutual; and by procuring a dispensation for himself. he at the same time set me, and all his other subjects free from the engagements which we came under to yield him obedience. It is childish and trifling to fay, that by means of the dispensation he is free, but that we who have not been dispensed with, are still as much bound as ever. For from the moment that he considers himself as disengaged, (by what means soever his obligation was dissolved) the condition on which we promifed obedience being removed, it must be absurd to reproach us with infidelity.

1580.

" I come now to that part of the proscription, in which I am accused of having been the author of all the disturbances that have happened. With fuch of you as are old enough to remember the rife of these disturbances, there will be no need to defend myself against so groundless an imputation; but for the fake of those who were too young at that time to form a judgment of what they faw, it is necessary I should give some account of those transactions, which are so grossly misrepresented in this infamous proscription.

" No person acquainted with the conduct of my accuser in his other dominions, or with the cruelties exercised in Granada, Mexico, and Peru, will be at a loss to account for the calamities with which the people of the Low Countries have been overwhelmed. In the very beginning of his reign, his despotic temper was conspicuous. The emperor his father faw it with deep concern, and when the count de Bossut, and I, and several others were present, he exhorted him to treat his Flemish subjects with greater moderation; and foretold, that if 1 580.

APPEN- if the pride and arrogance of his Spanish counsellors were not restrained, the people of the Netherlands would ere long be excited to revolt. But this wholesome counsel had not the effect which the emperor intended. His fon still consulted only with Spaniards; he still fostered as much as ever his passion for arbitrary power; and resolved, in contradiction to his interest, if rightly understood, as well as to his oath, to overturn our constitution. The condition annexed to your grant of the nine years supply, that the money should be disposed of by your own commissioners, excited in him and in his counsellors the most inveterate resentment. have been present, when these counsellors who knew well their master's sentiments, advised him to the pursuit of measures, by which you were all to have been adjudged to death. But it was by accident I came to know that these bloody counsels had been adopted. From the French king's own mouth, when I resided at his court as an hostage, I learnt that a plan had been concerted with the duke of Alva, to extirpate from France and the Netherlands all who were suspected of being favourably inclined to the reformed religion. cealed from the French monarch, my ignorance of the defign; and the indignation which it excited By the intercession of the dutchess of Savoy, I obtained leave to return into the Netherlands, where (I deny it not, on the contrary I glory in it) I promoted with all my influence that earnest request, which the States preferred to the king for the removal of the Spanish troops.

"I ACKNOWLEDGE, that amidst the numberless falsehoods with which this proscription is filled, there is truth in another part of the charge which is laid against me. I acknowledge, that after having remone strated in vain to the dutchess of Parma, against the cruel cruel and arbitrary measures that were pursued; APPRNbeing prompted by my dread of a civil war, by my concern for the calamities of the people, and by a sense of duty arising from the oath which I had fworn to maintain their rights, I called together the principal nobility, and attempted to open their eyes to the impending danger.

1 580.

"I ACKNOWLEDGE likewise, that I approved of the fupplication, which was presented by the nobility, against the placarts and executions. am far from being either ashamed, or sorry for the counsel which I gave. That supplication was not only the most moderate measure that could have been devised, but was strictly conformable to the constitution and practice of the Netherlands; and happy had it been for the king, as well as for the people, had he complied with the request which it contained.

"WITH respect to that part of the proscription, in which my accuser reproaches me, on account of the favours which I have shewn to the protestants a I confess, that before I embraced the reformed religion, I never hated those who professed it. Nor will this appear furprising, when it is considered that my mind had been early tinctured with its principles, and that my father who had established it in his dominions, lived and died in the problem. I confess, that even while, in consequence of my education at the emperor's court, I be build the catholic persuasion, I always abborred the lastante ties which were exercised by the popula inquiling I confess, that at the time of the king's it putting from Zealand, when he commanded the trip to death certain persons attached to the projection faith, I refused to obey, and gave their partition private warning of the danger to which the purch A renderly

APPEN- exposed. I confess, that in the council of State. I made all the opposition in my power to the persecutions that were proposed; partly from motives of compassion or humanity, partly from my conviction of the absurdity of punishing men for opinions which they could not change, when they did not disturb the public tranquillity; and partly from a persuasion, that the violent remedies employed were calculated to disappoint the end in view. while, for these reasons, I was from the beginning averse from persecution; you all know that I had no concern, either in the introduction of the reformed religion into the Netherlands, or in the rapid progress which it made during the government of the dutchess of Parma. You know, that at that time I possessed not the smallest influence with those, by whom it was introduced and propagated; and you likewise know, that with regard to those disorders, into which the protestants suffered their zeal to betray them, so far from giving them my countenance or approbation, I exerted my authority to restrain them; I punished the perpetrators with feverity, and have, on account of the rigour which I exercised, been, by many among the protestants, most cruelly calumniated and defamed.

> "I HOPE to be excused on this occasion, for obferving that there is one circumstance in the profcription, that gives me pleasure. Notwithstanding the malice and rancour, and contempt of truth which my accuser has discovered, there is one crime, often laid to the charge of the governors of provinces, of which he has not ventured to accuse me: I mean that of avarice, or the embezzlement of the public money. Of this despicable crime indeed, I have been accused by some unknown perfons in certain defamatory writings that have been circulated. But from the filence observed on this head by my inveterate enemy, these libellers may fee ice the folly, as well as falsehood of their infinua- APPENtions. To you there can be no occasion to vindicate my conduct. I give thanks to God, that I learnt at an early period, of how much consequence it was for one who governs a free people, not only to preserve himself untainted, but even to keep himself free from the suspicion of corruption. And you know, that on this account I have constantly declined taking any charge of the public money; and from the beginning of my administration, have transferred both the collection and distribution of it to others.

1580.

"I AM accused in the proscription, of having practifed to return into Holland, by undertaking to defend the people from the tax of the tenth penny, which, it is faid, was imposed upon them by the duke of Alva, without the king's confent; and I am accused likewise of having persecuted and expelled the catholics. If by practifing, my accufer means that I folicited for liberty to return, there is as little truth in this, as in his other affertions. I myself was most earnestly solicited; and I am ready to shew letters which I received, not only from the governors of towns, but from the citizens, intreating me to come and deliver them from the tyranny of the Spaniards. And in complying with these entreaties, what did I do, that my duty did not require from me? I attempted to deliver from flavery, the provinces which had been committed to my care; whose liberties I had sworn to maintain: and of the right to govern which, the king had no power, without the confent of the States to deprive me.

" No part of this profcription gives me greater furprise, than that in which I am accused of persecution. It is impossible but even the Romanists themselves must bear witness to the salichood of so injurious an imputation. No person in the Nether1580.

APPEN- lands can be ignorant, that far from employing rigour, I have often argued and remonstrated against it, and have promoted lenity in the treatment of the catholics to the utmost of my power. Of this, even my accuser himself seems to make an indirect acknowledgment. I feigned, he fays, that the persecution of the catholics displeased me. how does he know that I feigned? Have not my actions been at all times open? Why does he not judge from them of my intention? Never had one person less ground for accusing another of any crime, than my accuser has to cast on me the imputation of hypocrify. Did I, either before, or at the time when he conferred these obligations upon me, for which he has reproached me with ingratitude; did I ever offer the incense of flattery, either to himself or to the dutchess of Parma, or his tools and confidents in the council? On the contrary, did I not openly, and without disguise, condemn the measures which he had dictated, and which they purfued? Was it possible for me to speak more plainly than I did, or to give a clearer testimony of my aversion to his designs, than by defiring him, as I did frequently, to fuffer me to relign my governments, because it was not in my power to yield him the obedience which he require ed? Such was my conduct before my departure into Germany; and fince that time, is there a fingle step of my conduct that will admit of the interpretation of hypocrify? Did I not openly folicit aid from the German princes to oppose him? Have I not raised armies against him; taken towns which he possessed; repulsed his forces, and expelled him utterly from at least two of the provinces, over which he tyrannized? Is there any thing in this that can be termed hypocrify?

> "But my accuser will not find it so easy to vindicate his own conduct from this odious imputation. Read my defence which I published some vears years ago; and you will perceive to which of us APPEN-belongs the appellation of hypocrite and deceiver. DIX. In that defence, there are copies of letters which I received from him, filled with professions of friendship and regard, at the very time, when, as appears from the sequel, he had doomed me to de-Atruction.

429

1580.

" Bur why should I expect to be dealt with equitably, by one whose conscience allows him to affirm, that his minister the duke of Alva imposed the tax of the tenth-penny, and urged the levying of it with fuch inflexible obstinacy, without his authority or consent? Is it credible that one who knew this king's temper so well as Alva, and who had ever shewn the greatest solicitude to please him. would have prefumed, by a measure fo tyrannical and unprecedented, to run the risk of kindling a civil war? Or, if this wary Spaniard was in reality fo rash and presumptuous, can it be believed by any person who considers the important consequences with which his rashness and presumption were attended, that the king would not, long ere this time. have disavowed him, and made him feel the weight of his displeasure? Was not Alva punished for ordering his fon to marry his cousin, rather than another woman, whom he had debauched under a promise of marriage? Was not this old servant banished for this venial transgression, from his master's presence, and thrown into prison, from which he would never have been delivered, if one better qualified to tyrannife over the Portuguese could have been found in Spain? And what opinion must we form of a king, who for this private offence, could punish an ancient friend and servant with so much severity; while, notwithstanding the crime of treason, the most public and notorious, and productive of the most dreadful calamities to his faithful subjects, he not only suffered him to pass unpunished, but received him with open arms, and loaded employ the language of a good king, and boast of his affection for his people?"

In a great part of what remains of this apology, the prince of Orange enters into a detail of the transactions recorded in the preceding history. I shall therefore pass over this, and set before the reader what relates to the reproach, which Philip casts on William's marriage with the daughter of the duke de Montpensier, who was the princess of Orange at the time of publishing the proscription.

" My accuser," continues he, " is not satisfied with faying every thing that can blacken my character, and render it odious to the world; but he has likewise attempted to taint the honour of my wife." He fays, "that I have infamously married a religious woman, folemnly bleffed by the hands of the bishop, in contradiction to the laws of Christianity, and of the Romish church, and that I did so whilst my marriage subsisted with another woman." Though this affertion were strictly true, it would ill become this incestuous and adulterous king to accuse me. But you know that it is entirely without foundation. My marriage with my former wife, now dead, did not subsist, and the ground of her divorce was approved even by the doctors of the Roman church; and by those illustrious princes to whom the was allied. My present wife was not, even by the rules of the popish church, a religious woman, in the sense meant by my accuser. The duke of Montpensier, my father-in-law, who is fincerely attached to the catholic communion, (not as cardinal Granvelle, and other Spanish ministers, from interest, but from principle and conviction) spared no pains to put the lawfulness of his daughter's marriage beyond doubt or controversy. He found it the clear opinion, not only only of the principal persons in the Parliament of APPEN-Paris, but of several bishops and doctors whom he confulted, that even if a promise of celibacy had been given by my wife, yet, in confideration of her youth, it would not have been binding, as it would have been contrary to the rules of the Gallican church, to the decrees of the high court of justice in France, and even to the ordinances of the councils of Trent, to which my adversary pays fuch unlimited submission. He likewise found that in reality no such promise was ever made: that fundry protestations had been taken to prevent any person from imagining that his daughter ever intended to take the vow; and that even in her absence, the most undeniable evidence of this had been produced.

1580.

I said before, that although my marriage were not so unexceptionable as you see it is, even by the principles of the church of Rome, it would ill become my accuser to reproach me on account of it. He seems not to have remembered the common maxim, that whoever ventures to accuse another, ought to be well affured that he himself is innocent. And yet is not this king, who has endeavoured to stigmatise my lawful marriage with infamy, the husband of his own niece? It will be faid by his partifans, that he previously obtained a dispensation from the Pope. But does not the voice of nature cry aloud against such an incestuous conjunction? And in order to make room for this marriage, is it not true, that he put to death his former wife, the mother of his children, the daughter and fifter of the kings of France? I say not this, prompted by my refentment, rashly and at random. I affert, that in France there is evidence of the horrid deed of which I now accuse him.

DIX.

"IT was not a fingle murder that was perpetrated for the lake of this extraordinary marriage. His fon too, his only fon, was facrificed, in order to furnish the pope with a pretext for so unusual a dispensation; which was granted, in order to prevent the Spanish monarchy from being left without a male-heir. This was the true cause of the death of Don Carlos; against whom some misdemeanours were alleged, but not a fingle crime fufficient to justify his condemnation, much less to vindicate a father for embruing his hands in the blood of his fon. And if Don Carlos was in reality guilty of crimes deserving death, ought not an appeal to have been made to us, his future subjects? the right of judging, and pronouncing sentence of death against the heir of such extensive dominions, belong to Spanish friars and inquisitors, the obsequious flaves of the father's tyranny?

"Bu T perhaps this good king made conscience of leaving for his heir a prince, whom he knew to be born in unlawful wedlock. For Philip's marriage with the mother of Don Carlos was not less contrary to the laws of God and man, than that other of which I have already spoken. At the very time when he espoused the princess of Portugal, the mother of Carlos, his marriage sublisted with Isabella Oforis, by whom he had two fons, Pedro and Bernardino; a marriage brought about by Ruy Gomez de Silva, prince of Evoli, to which that nobleman was indebted for his power and greatness. And besides, is it not well known that this king lived in habitual adultery with another man, the lady Euphrasia? Did he not compel the prince of Ascoli to take that lady for his wife, when she was big with child by himself? And while it has been affirmed with certainty, that that unhappy man was taken off by poilon, do not even the Spanish courtiers ascribe his death to the grief which he conceived from the affront APPENto which he was obliged to submit, and the cruel necessity imposed on him, of acknowledging for his heir the adulterous bastard of another? Such, and so chaste has been the conduct of this king, who has the affurance to calumniate my lawful marriage as a violation of the facred laws of chaftity.

to

Bur I shall hasten to conclude this apology. after offering some remarks concerning the nature of the fentence that has been pronounced against It is in this part of the edict of profcription. that the compiler, whether the king himself, or some ignoble instrument of his tyranny, has employed all the thunder and lightning of his eloquence. But I thank God, it intimidates me no more, than the anathemas of Clement VII. intimidated my kinsman prince Philibert, when he belieged and took the pontiff prisoner in his castle of St. Angelo. After the proofs which I have given, that I fear not all the power which my adversary is possessed of; and after contending for fo many years against his best generals, with numerous armies under their command, it was weak in him to expect to frighten me with the high founding terms of this profcription. I have less reason now than formerly to dread the attempts of those abandoned wretches, whom he has endeavoured to instigate against me. For I am not ignorant, that before this time he has bargained with prisoners, and other murderers, to deprive me of my life. He has now given me a public warning of his bloody design. And with the divine affiftance, and the vigilance of my friends, I truft, that notwithstanding his diabolical machinations, my life shall be preserved so long as the prosperity and interest of this people, to whose service I have devoted it, shall require. " My Vol. II.

434 APPEN-

1580.

"My confidence on this head is greatly augmented by reflecting upon the indignation, which I cannot doubt will be generally excited by that extraordinary method of proceeding against me, which my adversary has adopted. For there is not, I am persuaded a nation or prince in Europe, by whom it will not be thought dishonourable and barbarous, thus publicly to authorise and encourage murder; except the Spaniards, and their king, who have been long estranged from every fentiment of honour and humanity. In having recourse to private assassination against a declared and open enemy, does not this mighty monarch confess his despair of being able to subdue me by force of arms? Does he not give a testimony in my behalf, and discover that he dreads the efforts which I may make against him? Is it not weak and mean, to make publicly so pusillanimous an acknowledgment? But the weakness and meanness of this conduct is not greater than the absurdity of his choice of the rewards, which he holds forth to those who shall execute his bloody purpose. it is not money only that he offers them, but nobility and honour; as if a regard to honour could influence a man capable of perpetrating a deed, held in universal reproach and detestation. And if any person already possessed of nobility were to pollute himself by so foul an action, would not his nobility be from that moment annihilated? Would not all fociety and connection with him be held dishonourable?

"EVEN my adversary himself seems to have been in some measure sensible of the truth of this. and therefore he addresses himself more particularly to criminals and malefactors, as those who are most likely to comply with his request. " And in order, says he, that his destruction may be the more effectually and speedily accomplished, we, defirous of punishing vice, and rewarding virtue, promife promise on the word of a king, and as the mini- APPENster of God, that if any person shall be found possessed of courage, and public spirit sufficient to animate him to the execution of this decree, and to free us from the aforesaid pest of society, we shall order to be delivered to him, either in land or money as he shall incline, the sum of twentyfive thousand crowns; and if he shall have committed any crime, however enormous, we promise to grant him our royal pardon, and if he be not already noble, we hereby confer nobility upon him, and likewise on all those who shall aid and affift him." Is not this in plain terms, calling on every desperate wretch, every outcast from society, to affift him in the execution of his delign? No crime, however enormous, but shall be pardoned; no criminal, however detestable, but shall be crowned with honour. Does this king deserve the title which he assumes, of a minister of God, who thus confounds the distinction between vice and virtue; and thus publicly avows his willingness to bestow the highest rewards and honours upon men, defiled with the most abominable crimes? Have I not ground to rejoice in being persecuted by one whose conscience allows him to have recourse to such unhallowed means? And is not such depravity of sentiment in my accuser, a testimony in behalf of my integrity?

I HAVE now faid all that feems necessary to vindicate my character from those false aspersions which are thrown out upon it in this proscription. Many things which I might have faid, I have purposely omitted. Had I descended to a particular account of the cruelty, accompanied with a contempt of the most facred obligations, which has been exercised by my accuser over this unhappy people, I should never have come to a conclusion. But with you there can be no occasion for giving a more particular detail. You have been specta-F f 2

Digitized by Google

tors of the horrid scene; and have borne your spix. share of those oppressions, which would fall to be described.

"But before I conclude, I must intreat you to reslect seriously upon the means to which our enemy finds it necessary to have recourse, in order to accomplish his designs. This infamous proscription, joined to the pains which he and his ministers continually employ to create division among the provinces, shews clearly that he now despairs of enslaving us by force of arms, while we remain united.

" IT is indeed against me chiefly, at this time, that his deligns are directed. "Were I removed, he says, either by death or banishment, tranquillity would be restored." You will easily conceive what tranquillity he means, if you call to mind your condition, before I returned into the Netherlands, when you groaned under the tyranny of the duke of Alva. Would to heaven that by my banishment or death you could be delivered from your calamities! My enemy should not in that case find it necessary to employ prisoners and assassins to destroy me: You all know how often I have exposed myself to danger in your defence. I leave it to you, to whom alone it belongs, to determine whether my life and presence be repugnant or conducive to the interest of the provinces. you only, and not to the king of Spain, I am accountable for my conduct. You have full authority (and I pledge myself to submit to it) to dispose, as you shall incline, either of my person, or of my life. Interpose that authority with which I acknowledge you to be invested, and give orders either for my departure from among you, or for my death; if you judge either the one or the other for the general good. But if, on the contrary, my past conduct has convinced you, as I trust it has, of the fincerity of my zeal and attachment, or if my APPENlong experience gives you confidence in my ability for conducting your affairs; I shall still continue to employ in your service, the talents which I possess, hoping that you will listen to the earnest exhortations which I have given you, to maintain harmony and concord in the state; and exert yourselves strenuously for the desence of this people, whom you have undertaken to protect; depending on the favour of the Almighty, that your endeavours for this end shall be attended with succefs."

APPENDIX

1 480.

INDEX.

E

ABEN HUMEYA, is elected king of the Morefor in the Morefor of the Moresco inhabitants of Granada, i. 247. Attempts to poffess himself of the city of Granada, 248. Commences hostilities aainst the Spaniards, but is forced to fly to the mountains, 249. fcattered followers return to his flandard, 251. Is murdered, 254. Albert, cardinal and archduke, is appointed governor of the Nether-lands, ii. 373. Undertakes the fiege of Calais, 375. Takes the Takes Artown by storm, 378. 379. Leaves France, 380. Lays siege to Hulft, 381. The gar-rison surrenders, 384. Surprises the town of Amiens, 391. Marries the infanta, and receives the fovereignty of the Netherlands, 405. Alcazar, battle of, between Sebastian king of Portugal, and Muley Moluc emperor of Morocco, ii. 78.

Alemaer belieged by Don Frederic de Toledo, i. 386.

Aldegonde, St. Philip de Marnix, lord of, promotes the agreement called the Compromise, against the establishment of the Inquisition in the Netherlands, i. 175. Is sent by the prince of Orange to the affembly of the States at Dort, 353. Is defeated and taken prisoner by the duke of Alva, 390. Defends the city of Antwerp against the prince of Parma, ii. 177. His speech to dissuade the garrison from a surrender, 18s. Assists count Hohenloe in the attack of the counter-dyke of Couvestein, 192. Is tied up by the capitulation from bearing arms for a year, 198. Aloft, is seized by the mutinous Spanish troops, ii. 2. Is recovered by the States, 134.

Alva, Ferdinand de Toledo, duke of, his character, i. 36. His inftructions on the violation of the truce of Vaucelles, 37. Leads an army into the Ecclesiastical State, 40. His motives to granting the pope a truce, 41. Advises Philip to awe the Netherlands by an army, 201. Leads an army thither, 202. Imprisons the counts Horn and Egmont, 204. The extraordinary powers he was invested with by Philip, 207. Institutes a council called the Council of Tumults, ibid. His violent proceedings, 208. His infolent reply to the magistrates of Antwerp, 211. Cites the prince of Orange to stand a trial, 215. Confiscates the prince's eftates, 216. His brutal proscriptions, 223. Paffes sentence on the counts Egmont and Horn, 226. Defeats count Lewis of Nassau, 230. Declines engaging the prince of Orange, 235. His vanity and arrogance on the prince disbanding his army, 272. His tyrannical profecutions, 273. Imprisons and confiscates the effects of the English merchants at Antwerp, 277. Inflames the Flemings by taxation, 279. His reply to the representations of the States, 282. Publishes an act of endemnity, 285. Inforces the tax of the teath penny, 287. Fills the city of Utrecht with foldiers, to live at free quarters upon the inhabitants, 290. His fentence against that city, ibid. His demands on the city of Brussels, 291. His indignation at the furprise of the fort of Louvestein, 295. Publishes an edict for the immediate payment of taxes, 296. His barbarous purpose against the inhabitants of Brussels, how prevented, 297. Complains of thequeen of England protecting the Flemish exiles, 298. The citizens of Flushing revolt on his attempt to fortify the citadel, 305. His fuccours to Middleburg intercepted, 311. Belieges Mons, 332. Cautiously avoids being forced to an engagement by the prince of Orange, 340. Attacks and worfts him in his retreat, 343. Takes Mons, 346. His army plunders Mechlin, 347. Orders his fon Toledo to persevere in the fiege of Haerlem, 375. His barbarity there, 383. Obtains his dismission from the government of the Netherlands, 391. Review of his administration, 39s. Incurs the king's difpleasure in the marriage of his son, ii. 89. Is appointed to command the forces employed against Portugal, 90. Commences his operations, 91. His barbarity on taking the town and castle of Cascaes, 93. Defeats Don Antonio, 95. Takes feats Don Antonio, 95. Lisbon, ibid. His cruelty there, 96. Alvaro de Sande, his gallant defence of the fort Gerba against the Turks, Malta, 157. Defeats the Turks, 159. Amieus, the town of, furprized by the archduke Albert, il. 391. Is befieged by Marshal Biron, 394. Is reta-

i. 103. Is sent with reinforcements to ken, 397.

Amsterdam, is ineffectually belieged by the count de la Marc, for its adherence to the Spanith interest, i. 355. The city accedes to the Pacification of Ghent, ii. 43.

Anastro, Gaspar, a Spanish banker at Antwerp, engages a man to affaffinate the prince of Orange, ii. 130. Anjou, duke of, receives application for affiftance from the Flemings, ii. 37. Concludes a treaty with the States, 46. The intention of this treaty how frustrated, 52. Apologises for his conduct to Elizabeth queen of England, 53. The fovereignty of the States conferred on him, 117. Raises the siege of Cambray, 124. Goes over to England on a prospect of being married to queen Elizabeth, 126. His arrival in the Netherlands, 129. Solicits affiftance from his brother the king of France, 136. Is refused, 137. to subvert the liberty of the Flemings, 138. Seises several towns, and attempts Antwerp, 139. Reconcilement between him and the States, 152. Goes to France, 155. Dies, 161. His character, 162.

Antonie, don, his pretentions to the crown of Portugal, ii. 81. Is declared illegitimate, 86. Is proclaimed king, 91. Is defeated by the duke of Alva, 95. Is again defeated by D'Avila, 98. Escapes, 99.

Antwerp, outrages committed by the reformers there, i. 185. Is garrifoned, and the protestant preachers banished, 195. Unsuccessful petition of the magistrates to Alva, 221. Is feized by the mutinous Spanish troops 409. Is facked by the Spaniards, ii. 9. Outrages committed by the protestants against the catholics there, 68. The duke of Anjou attempts to feize the city, 139. Is belieged by the prince of Parma, 174. A fortified bridge extended over the Scheld. 178. A fruitless attempt to destroy the bridge, 185. Attack of the counter-dyke of Couveftein, 192. Capitulates, 197.

Ardres, is taken by the archduke Albert, ii. 379.

Armberg, count, is fent by the duke of Alva to oppose count Lewis of Naffau, i. 220. Is defeated by him, 331.

Armada, invincible, of the Spaniards, its force, ii, 258. Is dispersed by a ftorm, 259. Is haraffed by the English fire-ships, 263. Is worsted in an engagement with lord Howard, 264. Causes of its failure, 266. Is finally ruined by storms, 268.

Arrages, the people of, displesse Philip II. by protecting Antonio Perez, ii. 326. Their conflitution of goii. 326.

vernment abolished, 329.

Arras, Anthony Perenot, bishop of, his speech to the convention of states of Ghent, i. 80. Is left principal counsellor of the dutchess of Parma, regent of the Netherlands, 86. His character, ibid.

Arfebet, duke of, invites the archduke Matthias, to be governor of the Ne-therlands, out of envy to the prince of Orange, ii. 32. Is imprisoned, but released by the mediation of the prince of Orange, 34.

Avanfon, the French ambassador at Rome, negociates a treaty between pope Paul IV. and the court of France, i. 27. Austria,

Digitized by Google

Auftria, house of, how a second the fovereignty of the Nobestands, i. 71. Austria, don Jo n of. is zoomed commander in calef ages it are Maresco revolters in Grinada, i. 253. His character, that. Consider . :> pointed to atilk int, age. Tori fubdues the revolters, ited Is madgeneralifimo of the feet at: against the Turks, 258. Gains the sympty at Lepanto, 259. The profession of this victory obstructed by his Venetian affociates, 262. Is offered the sovereignty of Greece, 253. Undertakes the reduction of Tunis, 267. Fortifies Tunis contrary to orders, 268. Tunis retaken, 269. Arrives at Luxemburg as governor of the Netherlands, ii. 13. His treaty with the States, 19. His admission to the government, 22. His impolitical conduct, 23. His duplicity, 14. Seizes on the caftle of Namur, 25. His defigns discovered, 28. Battle of Gemblours, 43. Is defeated by count de Boffut at Rimenant, 44. His death, 53.

Auftria, Erneft, archduke of, succeeds count Mansveldt in the government of the Netherlands, ii. 244. Invites the States to treat of peace, which they reject, ibid. His troops mutiny, 355. Dies, 356.

B.

Balagny establishes himself in the sovereignty of Cambray, ii. 363. The town delivered up to the count de Fuentes by the citizens, 365. The garrison capitulates, 366.

Battenburg, count of, succeeds the count de la Marc, in the command of the forces of the States of Holland, i. 360. Is defeated and killed in an attempt to relieve Haerlem, 378.

Belin, marquis of, is difgraced by Henry IV. for furrendering Ardres to the archduke Albert, ii. 380.

Bargen op Zoem, dispositions of the duke of Parma for besieging it, ii. 273.

Brown maniful, his operations against this to the of Farma, r. 154. Is for the article sections, 15R. Etc. 158.2 Exercises of Vernahom in carries, 384. Invols America, 15R. Ref. of th. 197.

En 11, 22 train of Hinland, defeats and a 12 De Games at Sacherlo, i. 337. Comincts a flost of flat-hottomed veile... defined for the relief of Levden, 42 N. His arrival, 423. Per fines in an attemy to relief eliriche, 422.

Bombs, the first invention of, ii. 276.

Bommes, the town of, feized by the prince of Orange, L 412.

Bessure, de perate defence of the garrion of, against the Spaniards, i. 438.

Bearse, the city of, taken by Martin Schenck, ii. 180.

Boffar, count of, his fruitless attempt to recover the Brill, i. 301. Massacres the townsmen of Rotterdam, 303. His orders for assembling the States of Holland dinegarded, 35a. Co-operates with Toledo at the siege of Haeriem, 376. Is defeated and taken prisoner by the Hollanders, 388. Defeats Don John of Austria at Rimenant, ii. 44. Dies, 10a.

Breda, a congress held there by Spanish and Dutch deputies to negociate peace, i. 426. Is taken by the Spaniards, ii. 123. Is seized by prince Maurice by stratagem, 28a.

Brederede, count, his application to the dutchess of Parms, 195. His infurrection and death, 195.

Brill, taken by the Flemish exiles, i. 297. Is attacked by count Bossut, 301. The inhabitants (wear allegiance to the prince of Orange, 302. The monks cruelly treated by the protestants, ibid. note.

Bruges, is delivered up to the prince of Parma, by the prince of Chimai the governor, ii. 160.

Bruffels, the duke of Alva's barharous refentment for the opposition to his taxes there, how disappointed, i. 297.

Digitized by Google

C.

Cadiz, expedition against, by the English, ii. 386. Is plundered, 187. Calais, the attack of, concerted by the duke of Guise, i. 53. Is taken, 54. Is belieged by the archduke Albert, ii. 375. Is taken by ftorm, 378.

Cambray, is belieged by the count de Fuentes, ii. 363. Is delivered up by the citizens, 365. The garrison capitulates, 366.

Caraffa, cardinal, cause of his personal resentment against the emperor Charles V. i. 25. Concludes a treaty between his uncle pope Paul IV. and the court of France, 27. His embaffy to the court of France, 31. Solicits a violation of the truce of Vaucelles, 32. Obtains a sufpension of arms for the pope, from the duke of Alva, 41. Caranza. See Toledo, abp. of.

Carles, Don, his history, i. 212. The turbulent designs formed by him, 213. Is poisoned by his father's order, 214.

Cafimere, John, count palatine of the Rhine, engages to affift the states of the Netherlands against the Spaniards, ii. 17. Is affifted with money by queen Elizabeth of England, 40. Joins the army of the states, 47. Is obstructed by the jealousy of the Catholics, 48. Affists the people of Ghent against the Walloons, 52. Goes over to England to justify his conduct to Elizabeth, 53.

Cafiel Redrigo, count de, his arguments to persuade Philip IL to part with the fovereignty of the Netherlands, ii. 403.

Catelet, besieged by the count de Fu-Gomeron's treaentes, ii. 360. chery and death, 361.

Caudebec, is befreged by the duke of Parma, ii. 320.

Charles V. emperor, bad consequences of his partial attachment to the Netherlands, i. r. Calls his son Philip into the Low Countries, 2. Endeavours to have him elected king of the Romans, 4. Solicits his brether Ferdinand to relign that dignity, 5. His scheme in marrying Philip to Mary queen of England, 6. Labours to reconcile the English to his marriage, 8. Philip's undutiful behaviour to him, 14. Refigns his dominions, 15. Procures the truce of Vaucelles, ibid. Computation of the number of persons destroyed during his reign for their religious principles, 68.

Charles IX. of France deludes the Protestants by the treaty of St. Germains, i. 322. Massacres the Protestants, 338. His treaty with count Lewis of Nassau, 403.

Chateau Cambrefis, negociations for peace between France, Spain, and England there, i. 60. Peace concluded, 63.

Chester, colonel Edward, is sent by the prince of Orange with ten companies of English to protect Leyden against the Spaniards, i. 414. men defert to the enemy, 415.

Chimai, prince of, his deceitful con-duct, n. 159. Is made governor of Bruges, 160. Delivers the town up to the prince of Parma, ibid.

Civitella, is belieged by the duke of Guise, i. 42.

Coligni, admiral de, defends St. Quintin against the duke of Savoy, i. 47. Is taken prisoner, 51. Is defeated at Montcontour, 321. Is killed in the massacre of Paris, 338.

Cologn, conferences entered into there for peace, between Philip and the States of the Netherlands, ii. 69.

Colonna, his military operations against the pope, i. 45.

Compromise, a copy of the agreement so termed, i. 176.

Condé, prince of, his diffatisfaction at the inordinate power of the Guiles, i. 65. Is killed at the battle of Jarnac, 321.

Corbeil, is taken by the duke of Parma, ii. 305.

Corfairs, of Barbary, some account of, i. 97.

Council of state, expel their differing members, and declare the mutinous Spanish Spanish troops rebels, ii. 4. Accept fuccours from the prince of Orange to profecute the fiege of Ghent, 12.

Council of Tumults, established by Alva in the Netherlands, i. 207. Arbitrary decree of, 208. The majority of the members decline acting, 211.

Coutras, battle of, between the duke de Joyeuse and the Germans, ii.

Cyprus, is invaded by Sultan Selim, i. 257.

D.

D' Andelet, is intercepted and routed in carrying a reinforcement to St. Quintin, i. 48. Is taken prisoner,

- D'Avila, raises the siege of Middleburg, i. 309. Commands a fleet at the fiege of Middleburg, 397. Defeats and kills count Lewis of Nasfau, 406. His troops mutiny, 408. He escapes from them, 409. Defeats Don Antonio king of Portugal, ii. 98.
- De Glimes, the Spanish admiral, defeated and killed by Boilot, admiral of Holland, i. 397.

De Thermes, mareschal, is defeated at the battle of Gravelines, i. 55.

taken prisoner, 57.

Denmark and Sweden, state of, at the time of Charles V. refigning his dominions, i. 19.

Deventer, is taken by prince Maurice, ii. 310.

Doria, Juanetin, takes Dragut the Corsair prisoner, i. 99.

Dort, affembly of the flates of Holland held there, i. 353. Send a Supply of money to the prince of Orange, 354.

Deurleus, besieged and taken by count de Fuentes, ii. 362.

Douza, Janus, defends Leyden against the Spaniards, i. 415.

Dragut the Corfair, some account of, i. 98. Makes himself master of Tripoli, 99. Carries a reinforcement to the Turks at Malta, 136. Is killed at the fiege of St. Elmo, 144.

Drake, Sir Francis, by his successes obliges Philip II. of Spain to post-pone his invasion of England, ii.

Du Lis, his gallant defence of Bornmene against the Spaniards, i. 438. Dunkirk is taken by the prince of Parma, ii. 155.

E.

Egmont, count, advises the battle, and gains the victory of St. Quintin, i. 48. Defeats mareschal de Thermes at the battle of Gravelines, 55. Is fent by the dutchess of Parma to represent the state of the Netherlands to Philip in Spain, 170. Complains of being deceived by Philip, 174. Refuses to command the regent's troops, 181. Pacifies the tumults of the reformers, 188. Justifies, and declares his readiness to support Philip's measures, 193. The prince of Orange's warning to him, 203. Is imprisoned by the duke of Alva, 204. His trial, 224. Petition of his countels to Philip, 226. Is executed, 228. His character, 229. Egment, the young count of, endeavours to seize the city of Bruffels for the prince of Parma, ii. 68.

taken prisoner by La Noue, 112. Elizabeth, queen of England, her motives for rejecting the proposed marriage with Philip II. of Spain, i. 61. Her stipulations respecting Calais, 63. Affords protection to the Flemish refugees, 274. Seizes money intended for Philip, in her ports, 276. Confiscates the effects of the Spanish and Flemish merchants, 277. Is induced to difcountenance the Flemish exiles, 299. Assists the revolted Flemings with money, ii. 17. Her policy with regard to the disturbances of the Netherlands, 38. Engages to supply the flates with money and troops, Apologies to Philip, 40. Her conduct on the treaty between the flates and the duke of Anjou, 47. Measures taken toward a marriage between her and the duke, 126. Her anxiety concerning the affairs of the Netherlands, 210. The sovereignty reignty of the United States offered to her, 211. Declines the offer, but enters into a treaty for their protection, 215. Sends Leicester with an army to their affishance, 216. Her partiality to him, 232. Review of her conduct, 251. Negociates with Philip, 253. Prepares to defeat his intended invasion of England, 255. The Invincible Armada totally ruined, 268. Her situation at this time, 272. Her expedition against Cadiz, 386. Oppose the peace between France and Spain, 399. Remonstrates to the king of France against it, 400.

Elmo, St. fort on the island of Malta, fiege of by the Turks, i. 154. Is taken by affault, 146.

England, objections of the English to the marriage of their queen Mary, with Philip II. of Spain, i. 7. Meafures taken by the emperor Charles to reconcile them to it, 8. The parliament refuses Philip the ceremony of coronation, 11. Philip returns to Spain, 12. State of, at the time of the emperor Charles's refignation, 18. The conquest of, projected by Philip II. of Spain, ii. 247. See Armada.

Erneft, archduke of Austria; see Auftria.

Escurial, the palace of, built in confequence of Philip's vow on gaining the battle of St. Quintin, i. 50.

Escurial, and the English armament against Cadiz, ii. 385. Takes and plun-ders the town, 387.

Europe, flate of, at the time of the emperor Charles's refignation, i.

18.

F.

Ferdinand, brother of the emperor Charles V. is folicited by him to refign his dignity as king of the Romans, i. 5.

Perdinand, the catholic, fubdues the Morefcoes in Spain, i. 239. Compels those of Granada to profess Christianity, 240. Reduces the inhabitants of the country, ibid.

Flemings, refuse to swear allegiance to Philip II. of Spain, i. 3. Their jealous caution in grants of money to him, 44. Their ancient commercial prosperity, 70. See Netherlands.

Flufbing, revolt of, against the Spaniards, i. 305. Don Petro Pacheco, the Spanish governor, put to death there, 307.

Fontains Françoife, battle of, between Henry IV. of France, and Valasco constable of Castile, ii. 367.

France, its political state in reference to Philip II. of Spain, i. 21. Character of the French at that time. The diffatisfaction of the nation at the peace of Chateau Cambrelis, 64. State of, the death of Henry II. 65. decrees of the council of Trent rejected by the court of, 123. Battles of Jarnac and Montcontour, The Protestants deceived by a treaty, 322. Massacre of the Protestants, 338. State of parties in, under Henry III. ii. 205. The catholic league, 206, 390. duke of Guife affaffinated, sor. The king affaffinated, sos. Acceffion of Henry IV. ibid. He cmbraces the catholic religion, 238. Calais taken by the archduke Albort, 378.

Frances II. of France, his accession, character, and administration, i.

65.

Fuentes, count of, succeeds the archduke Ernest as governor of the Netherlands, ii. 356. Enters vigorously into the exercise of his office, 358. Besieges Catelet, 360. Puts Gomeron to death, 361. Takes Dourlens, 362. Lays siege to Cambray, 363. The town and castle delivered up, 366. Resigns the government to Albert, 374.

G.

G.

Gemblours, battle of, ii. 42.

Gerard, Balthazer, affaffinates the prince of Orange, ii. 16a. His examination, 164. His sentence.

Germany, disgust received there at the behaviour of Philip II. of Spain, i.4. State of at the time of the emperor Charles's resignation, 18.

Gererudenburg, is taken from the Spaniards, by the Sieur de Payette, i. 300. Is betrayed to the Spaniards by the garrison, ii. 278. Is retaken by prince Maurice, 342.

Ghens, 2 woollen manufacture carried on in that city before the art was known in England, i. 70. The confederacy, called the pacification of, ii. 12. The duke of Arfchot feized and imprisoned there, 34. Discord between the inhabitants of, and the Walloons, 50.

Giambelli, his contrivances at Antwerp to destroy the prince of Parma's bridge, ii. 183. 188.

ma's bridge, ii. 183. 188.

Comeron, his private treaty with the count de Fuentes, for the delivery of Catelet, ii. 360. Is put to death by Fuentes, 361.

Granada, the Moorish inhabitants of, forced by Ferdinand the catholic, to profess Christianity, i. 240. Are oppressed by the inquisition, 241. Are disarmed by Philip II. 242. Philip's oppressive edict agrunkt them, 243. Remonstrate against it, 244. Revolt of the province, 246. Aben Humeya, their newly-elected king, attempts to possess himself of the city of Granada, 248. The Morescoes reduced by the marquis de Mondejar, 249. The province plundered by the troops, 251. The inhabitants take arms againft, ibid. Are totally subdued by Don John of Austria, 254. Dreadful severities exercised against them, 255.

Granvelle, cardinal, rigorously enforces Philip's edicts against heresics in the Netherlands, i. 162.

His removal applied for, 166. I removed by his own defire, 167. Continues to exert his influence over the king against his enemies in the Low Countries, 190. 200.

Grave, besieged by count Mansveldt, ii. 218. Is taken by the prince of Parma, 220.

Gravelines, battle of, between count Egmont and mareschal de Thermes, i. 55.

Gregory XIII. pope, persuades Philip II. to confer the sovereignty of Tunis on Don John of Austria, i. 268.

Groningen, is belieged by prince Maurice, ii. 351. Submits and accedes to the union of Utrecht, 354.

Gueldres, is betrayed to the duke of Parma, ii. 241.

Guerrero, archbishop of Granada, inslames Philip II. against the Moors, i. 241.

Guise, Francis duke of, leads an army into Italy to support the pope against the duke of Alva, i. 41. Besieges Civitella, 42. Is recalled, 51. Takes Calais from the English, 54. Takes Thionville, 55. He and his brother engross the administration under Francis II. 65.

Guise, Henry duke of, his political intrigues, ii. 205. Forms the catholic league, 206. Enters into a treaty with Philip II. of Spain, 207. Gains a victory over the Germans, 200. Is affaffinated by the king's order, 291.

H.

Haerlem, is befieged by Don Frederic de Toledo, i. 364. Speech of Riperda to the principal inhabitants, 3°5. The town described, 367. Surrenders, 382. Cruel treatment of the inhabitants, 383. Is seized and plundered by the mutinous Spanish troops, 384.

Hali, the Turkith admiral, defeated and killed at Lepanto, i. 259. Hanfiede, Adolphus, his fleet defroyed by the Zealanders, i. 411.

Hafcon,

Hascem, the Corsair, besieges Oran and Masarquivir, i. 106. Is forced to a precipitate retreat by the Spaniards, 107. Brings a reinforcement to the Turks at Malta, 149. Haranguer, Charles, carries a party of men secretly into Breda, and seizes the town for prince Maurice, ii. 283. Is made governor, 285.

Henry II. of France, his character and political conduct, i. 21. Concludes an alliance with pope Paul IV. against the emperor Charles V. 27. Agrees to the truce of Vaucelles, 30. Is persuaded to violate the truce, and renew the war, 34. His forces defeated before St. Quintin, 49. His motives to wish for a peace with Philip, 58. Peace of Chateau Cambrelis, 63. His death, 64.

Henry III. of France, his character, ii. 37. Refuses to assist his brother the duke of Anjou, 137. Is offered the sovereignty of the United States of the Netherlands, 204. State of parties in France, 205. His sirm reply to the representations of the Spanish ambassador, 209. Declines the offer of the States, 210. Declares himself the head and protector of the catholic league, 290. Procures the assassing of the brother the cardinal, 291. Is assassing the himself, 292.

Henry IV. of France, his accession, ii. 292. Defeats the duke of Mayenne, 293. Invests Paris, 294. Comparison between him and the duke of Parma, 296. Raises the fiege on the arrival of the duke of Parma, 209. Sends a defiance to the duke of Mayenne, 300. The duke of Parma deceives him by a stratagem, ibid. Disbands his army, 305. Collects troops and haraffes the duke on his return to the Netherlands, 307. Besieges Rouen, 314. Abandons the siege, 319. Blocks up the Spanish army at Caux, 321. Embraces the catholic religion, 338. The principal cities submit to him, 245. Publishes a general indemnity, 346. Besieges Laon, 347. Repels the attempts of the duke de Mayenne to raise the siege, 348. Laon capi-The dukes of Lortulates, 350. rain and Guise submit to him, 351. Declares war against Philip of Makes an alliance Spain, 358. with the United Provinces, 360. Defeats Valasco, constable of Castile, 368. Gains over the duke de Mayenne, 360. Obtains the expected absolution from pope Ciement, 170. Disgraces the marquis of Belin for the furrender of Ardres, 380. Befieges Amiens, 394. Listens to overtures for peace, 400. His reply to queen Elizabeth's remonftrances against it, 401. Concludes a peace at Vervins, 402.

Henry, Don, succeeds to the crown of Portugal, ii. 81. Discusses the claims of the several competitors for the succession after him, 83. Resolves to marry, 85. His death, 88.

Herenberg, count, deferts the interest of the United Provinces, and goes over to the Spaniards, ii. 159.

Hierges, count de, reduces several towns in the Netherlands, i. 432. Hobealoe, count, is appointed to the command of the seet of the United States, ii. 181. Attacks the counterdyke of Couvestein, 192. Relieves Grave, 219. Reduces Axel, and defeats Hautpeine, 241.

Holland, revolt of the provinces of, i. 319. Precautions taken there to withfland the Spanish power, 351. The States of, affemble at Dorr, 353. Establishment of the reformed religion, 358. Spanish seet under count Bossut, defeated by, 388. The States of, refuse to concur in the treaty with Don John of Austria, ii. 20. See United Provinces.

Hern, count, pacifies the tumultuous inhabitants of Tournay, i. 188. Is imprisoned by the duke of Alva, 204. His trial, 224. Is executed, 228.

Hartenfas,

Hortenfius, Lambertus, cruel perfidy of the Spaniards to, i. 362.

Howard, lord, the English admiral, his prudent management on the arrival of the Spanish Invincible Armada, ii. 261. Haraffes it with fire-ships, 263. Attacks the Spaniards fuccessfully, 264.

Hulft, is reduced by prince Maurice, ii. 312. Is fortified by him, and besieged by the archduke Albert, 381. Surrenders, 384.

I,

Jarnac, battle of, i. 321.

Idiaquez, endeavours to diffuade Philip II. from his projected invalion of England, ii. 248.

Jenlis, heur de, is defeated by Frederic de Toledo, and his suspicious death, i. 334.

death, i. 334.

Inquisition in Spain, its history, and mode of proceeding, i. 91. Effects League, catholic, formed in France by the duke of Guise, ii. 206. Is Delico II. of Spain, 207. of the Spaniards, 92. An Auto de fe celebrated in the presence of Philip II. 95. The Moors driven out of Spain by the severities of, Joyeuse, duke de, is defeated and killed at the battle of Coutras, ii.

Italy, the flates of, their dependence on Philip II. of Spain, i. 20. Its condition by the peace of Chateau Cambrelis, 67.

La Capelle, is taken by count Mansveldt, ii. 347.

La Marc, the count de, commands a fleet of Flemish exiles by commission from the prince of Orange, i. 199. Takes the Brill, 300. Besieges Amsterdam, 355. of his miscarriage, 356. His character, 359. Is deprived of his command and dies, 360.

La Noue, affifts count Lewis in the defence of Mons against the duke of Alva, i. 334. Mons capitulates, 346. Undertakes the defence of Maestricht against the prince of Parma, ii, 60. Is taken prisoner by the Walloons, 112. On what terms released, 113.

La Valette, grand master of Malta, his vigorous preparations to defend the island against the Turks, i. 131. His motives for defending St. Elmo. Retaliates the barbarity of the Turks, 147.

Lagny, is taken by the duke of Parma, ii. 303.

Lanzavecchia, governor of Breda, corrupts the garrison of Gertrudenburg to give it up to the duke of Parma, ii. 278. Loses Breda to prince Maurice by negligence, 282.

Laun, is belieged by Henry IV. of France, ii. 347. The duke of Mayenne endeavours in vain to raise the siege, 348. Surrenders, joined by Philip II. of Spain, 207. Henry III. declares himself its head and protector, 290. The duke of Guile and the cardinal his brother affaffinated, 291. The duke de Mayenne chosen commander chief, ibid. Mayenne defeated by Henry IV. 293. Paris relieved by the duke of Parma, 299. Convention of the flates of, 334. The dukes of Lorrain and Guife fubmit to Henry, 351. Is deserted by the duke de Mayenne, 369.

Leicester, earl of, is sent with English troops to the affiftance of the Dutch States, ii. 216. Is made governor, and commander in chief of all their forces. 217. Belieges Zutphen, 224. His arbitrary and imprudent conduct, 226. His feeble attempts to raise the siege of Sluys, 239. His intrigues disco-vered, 242. Differs with the States, 243. Resigns his government and returns to England, 245. Is appointed commander in chief of the English forces to oppose the Spanish Armada, 271.

Lepante.

Lepanto, battle of, between Don John Manfveldt, count, besieges Grave in of Austria and Hali the Turkish admiral, i. 259. Lewis XI. of France, how he lost the opportunity of bringing the fove-reignty of the Netherlands into his family, i. 72.

Lewis of Nassau, count, collects an army for the relief of the Netherlands, i. 219. Defeats count Aremberg, 220. Is defeated by the duke of Alva, 230. Is deceived by the offers of Charles IX. of France, 124. Scizes Mons. 326. Is belieged there by the duke of Alva, 332. Mons capitulates, 346. His treaty with Schomberg the French ambaffador, 403. Is defeated and killed at Mooch, by D'Avila, 407.

Leyden, is refleged by Requesens, i. 413. Its fituation deferibed, ibid. Is defended by Jans Doura, 415. Is blockaded, 4:6. Resolution and diffress of the inhabitants, 417. The country laid under water, 418. Is relieved by Builds, and the fiege raised, 422.

Lifton, the city of, submits to the duke of Alva, ii. 95.

Lorrain, cardinal of, his arguments for an alliance between France and the pope, against the emperor Charles V. i. 29. He and his bro- ther engross the administration under Francis II. 65.

Louveflein, the fort of, surprised by Herman de Ryter, i. 294. Is retaken, 295.

M.

Maestricht, is belieged by the Prince of Parma, ii. 57. Is taken by furprile, 61.

Malta, the island of, invaded by the Turks, i. 132. Siege of St. Elmo, 134. St. Elmo taken by affault, 246. Attack of fort St. Michael, 149. Arrival of Spanish succours, 157. The Turks retire, ibid. Reland, and are defeated by the Spamith reinforcement, 159.

Brabant, ii. 218. Belieges and takes Wachtendonck, 276. Is appointed governor of the Netherlands on the death of the duke of Parma, 333. Lays siege to Noyon, ibid. Fails of relieving Gertrudenburg, 342. Is prevented from taking Creveccur by prince Maurice, 343. Is fuperfeded in the government of the Netherlands, by the appointment of the archduke Erneft, 344. Invades Picardy, and takes the town of La Capelle, 347. Refigns his employment on the appointment of the count de Fuentes to be governor, 358.

Mary, queen of England, her character, and motives for marring Philip II. of Spain, i. 7. Summary of the marring articles, 8. Joins her hufband in a perfecution of the protestions, 12. Is left by her hufband, 13. Is prevailed on by him to engage in the war against France, 45. Her derth, 60.

Mary, p.incels of Portugal, married to Philip II. of Spain, i. 2.

Mary, daughter of Charles the Bold, married to Maximilian, son of the emperor Frederic III. i. 71. Her death, 72.

Matthias, archduke, is invited by the duke of Arschot and others to take upon him the government of the Netherlands, ii. 32. Is admitted by the States, 33. Leaves the Netherlands, 123.

Maurice, prince, success to the offices of his father, ii. 171. His character, 273. Gains pelieffich of Breda by a stratagem, 282. Provides for its fecurity, 286. Is made governor of Guelderland and Overyssel, 287. Takes Zutphen, 309. And Deventer, 310. Defeats the duke of Parma's cavalry by stratagem, ibid. Reduces Hulft and Nimeguen, 312. Subdues Steenwich and Coverden, 330. Takes Gertrudenburg, 342. Murderers employed to affassinate him by the court of Spain, 344. Undertakes the fiege of Groningen, 35x.

duces it, 354. Affords protection to the Spanish mutinous troops, 355. His operations obstructed by Mondragone, 371. Fortises Hulft, 581. Defeats and kills the count de Varas, 390. Progress of his operations, 397.

Maximilian, son of the emperor Frederic III. marries Mary daughter and heress of Charles the Bold, i. 71. Is seized and imprisoned at Bruges, 72.

Maximilian II. emperor of Germany, remonstrates to Philip II. of Spain, against the cruel administration of the duke of Alva in the Netherlands, i. 217. Mediates between Philip and the Dutch States, 425.

Mayenne, duke of, is appointed commander in chief of the forces of the League, ii. 291. Is routed by Henry IV. 293. Summons a convention of the States of the League at Philip's defire, 334. Marriage treaty for his fon and Philip's daughter Isabella, 341. Endeavours in vain to raile the fiege of Laon, 348. His masterly retreat, 349. Is reconciled to Henry, 369.

Mechlin, is garrifoned by the prince of Orange, i. 356. Is plundered by the duke of Alva's troops, 347.

Medina Cœli, duke of, his expedition to Tripoli, i. 100. His fleet dettroyed by the Turks, 102. The Flemish exiles take great part of the fleet he conducted to the relief of Alva, 310. Is appointed to succeed the duke of Alva in the government of the Netherlands, but declines the charge, 391.

Medina Sidenia, duke de, is appointed commander of the Spanish Invincible Armada, ii. 259. Delpairs of success, 265. Resolves to return to Spain, 267. His fleet ruined by a storm, 268. Arrives in Spain, ibid.

Mendoza, don Francis de, delivers Oran and Mafarquiver from the contair Hascem, i, 107.

Michael, St. fort of, at Malta, fiege of, by the Tucks, i. 149.

Middleburg, is besieged by count Tserart, i. 309. The siege raised by D'Avila, 310. Is besieged by the Zealanders, 396. Surrenders to the prince of Orange, 399.

Mondejar, marquis of, reduces the Moresco revolters in Granada, i. 249. His troops plunder the country, 251. Is removed from his command, 253.

Mondragone, leads a detachment of Spanish troops through a channel of the sea, to the relief of Tergoes, i. 316. Defends Middleburg against the Zealanders, 396. Surrenders by capitulation, 399. His vigorous preparations for the seege of Ziricsee, 440. Checks the operations of prince Maurice, ii. 371. His death, 372.

Mons, the city of, seized by count Lewis of Nashu, i. 326. Is besieged by the duke of Alva, 332. Capitulates, 3+6.

Montcontour, battle of, i. 321.

Montmorency, constable of France, his reatons against an alliance with the pope, against the emperor Charles V. i. 28. Persuades Henry to conclude the truce of Vaucelles, 30. Is defeated before St. Quintin, 49. Returns to France to negociate a peace, 60.

Mcoch, battle of, between D'Avila, the Spanish general and count Lewis of Nassau, i. 407.

Morefcoes, in Spain, the history of, i.

Morocco, state of that kingdom, ii. 75. Is invaded by Sebastian king of Portugal, 76. Battle of Alcazar, 78. Death of Muley Moloc, 79.

Muley Moloc, establishes himself in the sovereignty of Morocco, ii. 75. Enters into an alliance with Philip II. of Spain, 76. Dies during the battle of Alcazar, 79. His character, ibid.

Vot. II.

Mustapha, commands the Turkish troops sent to reduce the island of Malta, i. 132. Besseges St. Elmo, 134. Takes it by assault, 146. Retires from the island, 157. Lands again and is defeated, 159.

Mustapha, Cara, a celebrated corfair, fortifies himself at Pennon de Velez, i. 108. His fort reduced by the Spaniards, 110.

N.

Nacrden, cruel massacre of the townsmen of, by don Frederic de Toledo, i. 362.

Namur, the castle of, seized by don John of Austria, ii. 25.

Navarefe, the leader of the mutinous Spanish troops, conducts them from Alost to the relief of the Spaniards at Antwerp, ii. 8. Sacks the town, 9.

Netberlands, enquiry into the ancient state of, i. 69. Fall under the dominion of the house of Burgundy, 70. The fituation of the country favourable for commerce, ibid. The fovereignty transferred to the house of Austria, 71. Instances of the attachment of the emperor Charles V. to this country and its inhabitante, 73. Aversion of his fon Philip II. to them, 74. Edicts published against the Protestants, Rigorous tribunals erected, 77. New bishoprics established, ibid. The country filled with Spanish troops, 78. The dutchess of appointed regent, Parma Speech of the bishop of Arras to the convention of the States at Ghent, ibid. Apprehensions of the people, Arbitrary conduct of cardinal Granvelle, 162. The number of protestants increase by persecution, 165. Count Egmont's embassy to Spain, 170. Refult of deliberations to stop the growth of herefy, 173. The enforcement of the edicts against protestants revived,

A confederacy against the establishment of the inquisition entered into, 175. Speech of the prince of Orange in council, 178. The fubscribers of the compromise petition the regent, 182. Intemperate zeal of the reformers, 184. The regent railes forces, 190. Valenciennes and Antwerp garrisoned, 194. Quiet restored, 196. duke of Alva fent thither with an army, 202. The prince of Orange retires to Germany, 203. counts Horn and Egmont imprisoned, 204. The inhabitants defert to foreign parts, 205. The dutchess of Parma retires, 206. The extraordinary powers Alva was invested with, 207. The Council of Tumults established, ibid. The violent proceedings of Alva, 208. Count Lewis of Nassau raises an army, 219. Defeats count Aremberg, 220. Deaths of the counts Egmont and Horn, 228. Count Lewis defeated by the duke of Alva, 230. The prince of Orange raises an army and publishes a manifesto, 232. Is obliged to disband his forces, 237. Tyrannical pro-fecutions of the duke of Alva, 273. Great desertion of the inhabitants, 274. The people inflamed by taxation, 279. Opposition of the asfembly of the States, 281. Act of indemnity published, 285. Its reception, 286. Resolute conduct of the states of Utrecht, 288. The city of Utrecht filled with foldiers, 290. Intrigues of the prince of Orange, 293. The fort of Louvestein surprised by Herman de Ryter, 294. The duke of Alva publishes an edict for the immediate payment of his taxes, 296. Violent commotions, especially at Brusfels, 297. The Brill taken by the exiles, ibid. Count de Bossut masfacres the townsmen of Rotterdam, 303. Revolt of Flushing, 305. Revolt of the other towns of Zealand, 308. Siege of Middleburg, The duke de Medina Cœli's 309.

fleet destroyed, 310. Other captures at sea, 311. Siege of Tergoes, 312. Extraordinary relief of, 316. Revolt of the province of Mons seized by Holland, 319. count Lewis of Nassau, 326. Ruremond and other towns taken by the prince of Orange, 335. Mons taken by Alva, 346. Mechlin plundered by Alva's troops, 347. Mechlin Barbarities exercised at Zutphen, 349. Assembly of the States of Holland at Dort, 353. Massacre at Naerden, 362. Alva removed, and the duke de Medina Cœli appointed governor, 391. Who declining the charge is succeeded by Requesens, ibid. Ineffectual negociations for peace at Breda, 426. Reduction of Ziricsee by the Spaniards, 439. Death of Requesens, 443. Mutiny of the Spanish troops, ii. 2. They fack the city of Ant-werp, 9. Pacification of Ghent, The prince of Orange's advice to the States, 14. They apply to foreign powers for aid, 17. Form a new deed of union at Brussels, 18. Their treaty with Don John of Austria, 19. The departure of the Spanish troops, 22. The castle of Namur seized by Don John of Austria, 25. The States get a number of towns into their possession, 28. Invite the prince of Orange to refide at Bruffels, 30. The prince is counteracted by the duke of Arschot, 32. The archduke Matthias chosen governor, 33. A new treaty of union, 36. The duke of Anjou applied to for affiftance, 37. Return of the Spanish troops, 41. Battle of Gemblours, 42. powers of the prince of Orange and the archduke Matthias enlarged, 44. The States conclude a treaty with the duke of Anjou, 46. operations of their numerous forces obitructed by diffentions, 47. The decree called the peace of religion, Discord between the Flemings and Walloons, 50. Their forces dispersed, 52. Death of don John of Austria, 53. The prince of Parma appointed governor, 55. He lays siege to Maestricht, 57. Maestricht taken by surprise, 61. The Walloons gained over by the prince of Parma, 64. The treaty called the union of Utrecht, 65. Conferences for peace at Cologn, 69. The States resolve to transfer their allegiance from Philip to the duke of Anjou, 110. The fovereignty conferred on him, 117. All allegiance to Philip of Spain folemnly abjured by the united States, 121. Return of the Spanish troops, 135. Attempt of the duke of Anjou on the city of Antwerp, 139. Reconcilement of the States with the duke, 152. Discontents of the people, 154. Death of the duke of Anjou, 161. The prince of Orange affaffinated, 162. Is succeeded in his offices by his fon prince Maurice, 171. Great progress of the prince of Parma, 172. Siege of Antwerp, 174. The city capitulates, 197. Brabant deserted by many of its Their critical inhabitants, 200. fituation on the death of the prince of Orange, 203. Offer the lovereignty to the king of France, 204. To the queen of England, 211. Treaty with Elizabeth, 215. The earl of Leicester sent to their asfistance, 216. Great famine and pestilence, 234. Ill consequences of the duke of Parma's expedition to France, to the Spanish cause, 308. Death of the Duke of Parma, 330. Count Mansveldt appointed governor, 333. Ernest, Archduke of Austria, appointed governor, 344. Who is succeeded by the count de Fuentes, 356. Cambray delivered up to Fuentes by the citizens, 365. The archduke Albert appointed governor, 373. The sovereignty of, transferred to him, 405. This deed how received there, 406. See United Provinces.

G g 2 Nimeguen,

Nimeguen, is taken by prince Maurice, ii. 312.

Norris, colonel, diftinguishes himself at the head of a body of English, at the battle of Rimenant, ii. 45.

Noyon, is besieged by count Mansveldt, ii. 333.

Nuys, the destruction of, by the Spanish troops, ii. 233.

О.

Oran, besieged by the corsair Hascem, i. 105. The siege raised by the Spaniards, 107.

Orange, William I. prince of, his family and character, i. 83. Origin of the difgust between him and Philip II. of Spain, 84. Applies for the removal of cardinal Granvelle, 166. Oppoles the admission of the decrees of the council of Trent, 168. Opposes the instructions given to count Egmont, 170. Declines enforcing the edicts against the protestants, 174. His speech in the council, 178. Punishes the rioters at Antwerp, the reformers, Tolerates ibid. His reasons for this indulgence, 187. Desires seave to refign his employments, 191. Is informed of the king's secret intentions against him, 192. Retires to Refuses to obey Germany, 203. the duke of Alva's citation, with his reasons, 215. His estates con-Applies to the fiscated, 216. emperor Maximilian for his inter-His inducements polition, ibid. Pubto take up arms, 217. listies a manifesto, 232. Professes the reformed religion, 233. Passes the Macle, 234. Offers Alva buttle, 235. Is obliged to difband his army, 237. Prepares to resume his operations for the relief of the Netherlands, 292. Grants a commission to the count de la Marck, 299. Gives the command of all the forces in Zealand to the count Tferart, The province of Holland induced to revolt by his negocia-His military prepations, 320. rations, ibid. Takes Ruremond 335. Is received at Methlin, 336. Takes several other towns, ibid. Endeavours in vain to provoke Alva to an engagement, Is attacked and worsted, 3+3-Disbands his army and returns to Holland, 345. Receives a supply of money from the affembly of the States at Dort, 354. Is appointed commander in chief of all their forces, 355. His moderation and prudent regulations, 357. Establishes the reformed religion, 358. Equips a fleet against the Spanish at Middleburg, 397. Reduces Middleburg, 399. Seizes the town of Bommel, 412. His measures for the relief of Leyden, 418. His attempts to relieve Ziricfee, 441. Projects the union of the provinces, in the pacification of Ghent, His advice to the States on the arrival of don John of Austria, 14. Goes, by invitation, to refide at Bruffels, 30. counteracted by the duke of Arschot, 32. Pacifies the people of Ghent, 62. Accomplishes the affociation called the union of His reply to Phi-Utrecht, 65. lip's private offers, 71. Sends affiftance to Sebaftian king of Portugal against the emperor of Morocco, 76. Justifies his conduct against the popular clamours, 103. Advises the States to renounce their allegiance to Philip, 106. Is proferibed by Philip, 119. His apology addressed to the States, An attempt made to affaifinate him, 131. His advice to the States on the duke of Anjou's treachery, 147. Other attempts made to get him affaffi-Leaves Antwerp on nated, 153. account of injurious fuspicions entertained entertained against him, 156. Is killed by Balthazar Gerard, 162. His character, 166. Abstract of his famous apology, 415. See Maurice.

P.

Pacheco, don Pedro de, put to death by the inhabitants of Flushing, i. 307.

Paris, massacre of the protestants there, i. 338. Is invested by Henry IV. of France, ii. 294. Great distress of the Parisians, 298. The siege raised by the arrival of the duke of Parma, 299. Submits to Henry IV after his con-vertion, 345.

Parma, Margaret, dutchess of, made regent of the Netherlands, i. 80. Persecutes the protestants in concert with cardinal Granvelle, 162. Publishes the decrees of the council of Trent, 169. Sends count Egmont to Spain, 170. points a conference to confider of means to stop the growth of herely, 172. Which offends Philip, 173. Revives the persecution of the protestants, 174. Her anfwer to the petition of the nobles, Transmits the petition to Spain, 184. Railes forces by Philip's command, 190. Her success in suppressing the reformers, 194. Diffuades Philip from tending an army into the Low Countries, 201. Obtains leave to retire from the Netherlands, 206.

Parma, Alexander Farnese, prince of, lays siege to Navarino, i. 265. Is ordered by Philip to lead the Spanish troops back to the Netherlands, ii. 41. Battle of Gemblours, 42. Is appointed to succeed don John of Austria 28 governor of the Netherlands, 55. His character, ibid. Besieges Maestricht, 57. Takes the town by furprise, 61. Gains over the Walloons, 64. Possesses himself of Courtray, 112. Is forced to abandon the fiege of Cambray by the duke of Anjou, 124. Obtains a return of the Spanish troops, 135. Takes Dunkirk, 155. With several other towns, 156, 158. Bruges delivered up to bim by the prince of Chimai the governor, Reduces several principal towns, 172. His lenity toward the inhabitants, 173. Besieges the inhabitants, 173. Blockades the Antwerp, 174. Scheld by a bridge, 177. De-scription of this bridge, 178. Repairs the bridge, after an attempt made to destroy it, 187. Fortifies the counter-dyke of Couvestein, 190. Recovers the possession of it, 194. The city of Antwerp submits to him, 197. His great power in the Netherlands, 203. Takes Grave in Brabant, 220. Besieges Venlo, ibid. Takes the town by capitulation, 222. His motives to attack Nuys, 223. Lays fiege to Rhineburg, 224. Befieges Sluys, 237. Diffuades Philip from invading England, 250. His preparations to co-operate with the Invincible Armada, 258. Meditates the fiege of Bergen-op-Zoom, 273. Is deceived by two English soldiers, 274. Abandons the attempt, 276. His difficulties and anxiety, 277. Mutiny among his Spanish troops, 282. Sends a reinforcement to the duke of Mayenne, 205. His first expedition into France, Comparison between him and Henry IV. ibid. His wife precautions on entering France, Raises the siege of Paris, 299. Deceives Henry by a stra-Takes Lagny, 303. tagem, 300. Possesses himself of Corbeil, 305. Returns to the Netherlands, 305. His cavalry defeated by prince Maurice, 310. Marches again into France, 315. Invelts the town of St. Esprit de Rue, 319. Raifes the the fiege of Rouen, ibid. Is wounded at Caudebec, 320. His army blocked up by Henry IV. at Caux, 321. Escapes by passing the Seine, 324. Returns to the Netherlands again, ibid. Is ordered back to France and dies, 330. His character, 331.

Paul IV. pope, his character and conduct, i. 23. The ambition of his nephews, 25. Cause of his animofity to the emperor Charles V. ibid. Concludes an alliance with France against the emperor, 27. Induces Henry to break the truce of Vaucelles, 34. His violent conduct, 35. Passes a sentence to deprive Philip II. of the fovereignty of Naples, 38. His dominions invaded by the duke of Alva, 40. His forces Obtains a truce, 41. defeated by Colonna, 43. Obtains peace from Philip, 52. Dies 67.

Payette, Sieur de, takes San Gertrudenburg from the Spaniards, i. 390.

Pembroke, earl of, joins the duke of Savoy with a body of English forces, i. 46. Is fent home, 51. Pennon de Velez, the fort of, reduc-Pennon de Velez, the fort of, reduced by don Garcia de Toledo, i.

Perez, Antonio, his base treatment by Philip, II. of Spain, ii. 325.

Philip II. king of Spain, his birth and education, i. 1. His character. His first marriage, ibid. called by his father into the Low-Countries, ibid. Unpopularity of his manners, 3. Disgusts the Germans, 4. Returns to Spain, 6. Marries Mary queen of England, Summary of the marriage articles, 8. Arrives in England, 9. His behaviour and manners, 10. Is refused the ceremony of coronation, 11. His endeavours to remove the prejudices entertained against him, ibid. Instigates a persecution of the English protestants. 12. Leaves England, 13. His undutiful behaviour to his father, 14. Review of his dominions and the extent of his power, 17. Dependence of the pope on him, so. His conduct on Henry II. of France breaking the truce of Vaucelles, 37. Is deprived of the fovereignty of Naples by the fentence of pope Paul IV. 38. His scruples as to opposing the pope by violence, explained, 39. Orders Alva to invade the pope's dominions, 40. Levies forces in the Low Countries against France, 44. Engages Eng-His behaland in the war, 45. viour on the victory at St. Quintin, 50. Takes the town, 51. Neglects the improvement of his advantages, ibid. Concludes a peace with the pope, 52. His motives to defire a peace with France, 58. Projects a marriage with queen Elizabeth, 61. His conduct with respect to his allies, 63. State of his affairs in Italy on the peace of Chateau Cambrelis, and death of Henry II. of France, 67. His 2version to the Flemings, 74. His edicts against the protestants, 76. His rigorous tribunals for the extirpation of herefy, 77. Fills the Netherlands with Spanish soldiers, Appoints the dutchess of Parma regent, 79. Meets a convention of the States at Ghent, 80. His inflexibility in religion, 82. Origin of the difgust between him and the prince of Orange, 84. Returns to Spain, 89. His partiality to Spain, 90. Orders Caranza, archbishop of Toledo, to be prosecuted by the Inquisition, 94. Enjoys the spectacle of an Auto de Fe, 95. The prudence of his civil government, 96. His unfuccessful armament against Tripoli, 100. His great preparations to reduce Pennon de Velez, 108. Wishes to exclude all protestants from attending the council of Trent, 117. Acknowledges the authority of the council, and orders obedience to its decrees,

His vigorous meadecrees, 125. fures to affift the knights of Malta against the Turkish invasion, 130. But ungeneroully neglects affifting them, 155. Sends troops at length who defeat the Turks, 159. Evades the prince of Orange's application for the removal of cardinal Granvelle, 166. His reception of count Egmont, 171. Is offended at the consultation about means to stop the growth of heresy in the Netherlands, 173. The grounds of his aversion to the prince of Orange, and the counts Horn and Egmont, 189. Resolves to awe the Netherlands by an army, 201. Sends Alva thither, 202. The extraordinary powers he invested Alva with, 207. History of his son don Carlos, 212. Orders him to be poisoned, 214. His reply to Maximilian's remonstrance on the duke of Alva's conduct, 217. Is infligated against his Moresco subjects, 241. Difarms them, 242. His oppressive edict a-gainst them, 243. The province of Granada revolts, 246. Makes flaves of the prisoners, 250. His dreadful severities against the revolters when subdued, 255. Enters into a league with the pope and Venetians against the Turks, 258. His behaviour on the victory of Lepanto, 262. Recedes from his demand of the tenth and twentieth pennies from the Netherlands, 352. Is perfuaded by the emperor Maximilian to negociate with the prince of Orange, 425. Appoints don John of Austria governor of the Netherlands, ii. 13. Absolutely refuses to remove him, and ratify the election of Matthias, 43. Motives of his neglect in supporting don John of Austria, 54. Is suspected of poisoning him, ibid. Confents to the treaty between the prince of Parma and the Walloons, 4. His conduct in the conferences at Cologn, 70. His private offers to the prince of Orange, 71. His inreview with Sebastian king of Porregal, 75. His negociations with Muley Moloc and the Turkish fultan, 76. His pretensions to the kingdom of Portugal, 81. His manifesto, 85. Invades Portugal, 91. Conquers it, 99. Offers a reward for the life of the prince of All allegiance to Orange, 119. him folemnly abjured by the States of the United Provinces, 121. His attention to the affairs of France, 206. Enters into a treaty with the duke of Guise, 207. Meditates the conquest of England, 247. His Invincible Armada, 258. This fleet totally ruined, 268. His magnanimity on this disafter, 270. His views on France, 294. Sends the Duke of Parma to France to oppose Henry IV. 295. Orders the duke of Parma to march again to the affistance of the League in France, 315. His base treatment of Escovedo, and Antonio Perez, 325. Sends troops to chastise the people of Arragon, 328. Abolishes the constitution of the Arragonian government, 329. Appoints count Mansveldt governor of the Netherlands, 333. Procures a convention of the States of the Catholic League in France, 334. His interested viewa discovered by the French, 335. State of his affairs, 341. Appoints the archduke Ernest governor of the Netherlands, 344. His motives for continuing hostilities against Henry IV. of France, 346. His reply to Henry's declaration of war, 359. Invades Burgundy, 367. Undertakes a descent upon Ireland, 385. Cadiz plundered by the English, 387. His fleet against Ireland destroyed by a storm, 388. His expedient to free himself from his pecuniary embarrasiments, His motives to a peace with France, 398. Concludes a peace at Vervins, 402. Refigns the fovereignty of the Netherlands to his fon-in-law, the archduke Albert, 405. His illness and death, 407. His character, 408.

Piala,

Piala, the Turkish admiral, destroys the Spanish fleet under the duke of Medina Cœli, i. 102. Commands the Turkish fleet sent against Malta, 130, 132.

Pius IV. pope, dissuades the duke of Savoy from calling a provincial fynod, i. 114. Is forced to agree to the re-assembling of the council of Trent, 116. Governs the proceedings of the council, 119. Dissolve the council abruptly, 121. Confirms its decrees by a bull, 122.

Pius V. pope, his character, i. 257.
Applies to the princes of Europe to unite against the Turks, ibid. His death. 266.

death, 266.

Plumart, his expedient for raising the fiege of Tergoes, i. 313.

Partocarrero, governor of Dourlens, his stratagem for the surprise of Amiens, ii. 392. Is besieged and killed there, 395.

Portugal, state of, at the time of the refignation of the emperor Charles V. I. 19. State of the disputed succession to the crown, ii. 73. Death of Don Henry, 81. State of the pretentions of feveral candidates for the fuccession, ibid. Don Antonio declared illegitimate, 86. Death of Don Henry, 88. Don Antonio proclaimed king, 91. Is invaded Lifbon ' by the Spaniards, ibid. fuhmits to Alva, 95. Is entirely subjected, 99.

Protestants, cruel edicts published against in the Netherlands, by the emperor Charles V. and Philip II. of Spain, i. 76. Inquisitorial proceedings against them, 77. Refuse to attend the council of Trent, and why, 118. Valenciennes reduced and garrisoned, 194. Antwerp garrisoned, ibid. Mussacre of, at Paris, 338.

(

onintin, St. is besieged by the duke of Savoy, i. 47. The French army under Montmorency, deseated there, 49. The town taken, 51.

R.

Reformation, the rapid progress of, i. 67. Penetrates even into Spain, 93. Progress of, 112, 169. See Protest-ant.

Renneburg, count of, is enticed over to the Spanish interest, ii. 114. His death, 116.

Requesens, grand commendator, acts as lieutenant to Don John of Austria, at the battle of Lepanto, i. 258. Succeeds the duke of Alva in the government of the Netherlands, 391. His character and first transactions, 395. Imprudently suffers the mutinous Spanish troops to take possession of Antwerp, i. 409. Publishes an act of indemnity, 412. Besieges Leyden, 413. Undertakes the conquest of Zealand, 432. Transports a body of forces through an arm of the sea to Duveland, 433. Besieges Bommene, 438. And Ziricse, 439. His death, 443.

ceffion to the crown, ii. 73. Death of king Sebaltian, 80. Acceffion of Don Henry, 81. State of the pretentions of feveral candidates for the fuccession, ibid. Don Antonio Rimenant, battle of, ii. 44.

Riperda, his speech to the principal inhabitants of Haerlem, i. 365. Is beheaded by the Spaniards, 383.

Rome, its dependance on Philip II. of Spain, i. 20.

Rone, the Sieur de, persuades the archduke Albert to undertake the siege of Calais, ii. 375. Is intrusted with the conduct of it, 376. Takes the town by storm, 378. Is killed at the siege of Hulst, 383.

Rotter dam, the townsmen of, massacred by count de Bossut, i. 303. Rouen, is besieged by Henry IV. of Rouen, is besieged by Henry IV. of France, ii. 314. The siege raised by the duke of Parma, 319. Ruremond is seized by the prince of Orange, i. 335.

s.

Sacherlo, naval engagement of, between the Dutch and the Spaniards, i. 397.

Santa Croce, marquis of, commands the Spanish fleet employed against Portugas, Portugal, ii. 89. Is appointed commander of the Invincible Armada, but dies, 259.

Savey, Philibert Emanuel duke of, commands an army in the Netherlands to act against France, i. 44. Is joined by the earl of Pembroke, 46. Lays siege to St. Quintin, 47. Defeats Montmorency there, 49. His ineffectual perfecution of his reformed subjects, 115.

Schelde, description of the prince of Parma's fortified bridge over, for the blockade of Antwerp, ii. 178.

Schenck, Martin, his brave attempt for the relief of Venlo, ii. 221. Builds a fort on the Rhine, and over-runs the country round, 280. Is killed in an attack on Nimeguen, 281.

Scwartzenburg, count, is fent by the emperor Maximilian to treat with the prince of Orange, i. 425.

Sebaftian, king of Portugal, his character, ii. 74. Undertakes the invasion of Morocco, 75. His interview with Philip of Spain, ibid. Lands in Africa, 77. Battle of Alcazar, 78. Is killed, 80.

Sclim, Sultan, invades the island of Cyprus, i. 257. A league formed against him by pope Pius V. Philip II. of Spain, and the Venetians, 258. His sleet descated at Lepanto, 259. Concludes a separate peace with the Venetians, 266. Dies, 270.

Seffa, Don Carlos di, burned at an Auto de fe, in the presence of Philip II. i. 95.

Sid iev, Sir Philip, death of, ii. 225. Sixtus V. pope, encourages Philip II.

of Spain to the invasion of England, ii. 251.

Streys, besieged by the duke of Parma, ii. 237. Capitulates, 241.

Solyman, emperor of the Turks, his conquests, i. 96. Destroys the Spanish fleet fent against Tripoli, 102. His preparations to reduce the island of Malta, 129. His troops driven from the island, 159.

Sonoy, Theodore, commander of the Dutch fleet, defeats count Bossut the Spanish admiral, i. 388.

Spain, the history of the Moors in, i. 239. The country defolated by the feverities exercised against them, 241. Revolt of the province of Granada, 246.

Spa iish troops, those under D'Avila in the Netherlands, mutiny for want of pay, i. 408. Another mutiny of, ii. 2. Seize Alost, ibid. Are declared rebels by the council of state, 3. See Navarese.

т.

Tergoes, siege of, 312. Its situation, 313. Extraordinary relief of, 316. Thiomoille, is taken by the duke of Guise, i. 55.

Toledo, Caranza, archbishop of, is suspected of inclining to the reformed opinions, i. 93. Is prosecuted in the inquisition by order of Philip

II. 94.

Toledo, Frederic de, son of the duke of Alva, blockades Mons, i. 332. Lays divers towns under contribution, 348. His barbarous treatment of Zutphen, 349. His great progress in reducing the revolted towns, 361. His cruel massacre at Naerdan, 362. Besieges Haerlem, 368. Is ordered by his father to persevere in the siege, 375. His persidious barbarity to the garrison and inhabitants, 383. His troops mutiny, 384. Besieges Alcmaer, 386.

Toledo, Don Garcia de, reduces the fort of Pennon de Velez, 109. Is made viceroy of Sicily, 110.

Tournay, the tumults of the reformers there quieted by count Horn, i.

188

Tournbout, battle of, between prince Maurice and the count de Varas,

ii. 390.

Trent, summary account of the council of, i. 113. State of Europe at that time, 114. The meeting of revived by pope Pius IV. 116. Reasons why the protestants resuled to attend it, 118. Is governed by the pope and his legates, 119. Is abruptly concluded, 121. Its decrees crees confirmed by a papal bull, 122.

Its decrees rejected by the court of France, 123.

Tripoli, taken and fortified by the Corfair Dragut, i. 99. Unfuccessful expedition of the Spaniards against, 100.

Tierart, count de, defends the province of Zealand for the prince of Orange, i. 308. Besieges Middleburg, 309. Besieges Tergoes, 312.

Tunis, is taken by Don John of Auftria, i. 267. Is retaken by the Turks, 269.

V.

Valdez, is intrusted by Requesens with the reduction of Leyden, i. 415. Confines his operations to a blockade, 416. Is forced to raise the siege, 423. Is accused by his soldiers of being bribed and is ill treated, 424. Note.

Valenciennes; the city of, reduced and garrifoned by the regent, i. 194.

Valor, Don Ferdinand de, is elected king by the Moresco inhabitants of Granada, i. 247. See Aben Humeya. Varas, count de, is defeated and killed by prince Maurice, ii. 389.

Varambon, marquis of, is defeated by colonel Vere, ii. 281. Is defeated and taken prisoner by marshal Biron, 384.

Vargas, a Spanish officer, plunders Maestricht, ii. 6.

Vaucelles, truce of, procured by the emperor Charles V. previous to his refignation, i. 16. Is broken by Henry II. of France, 34.

Velasco, constable of Castile, invades

Burgundy, ii. 367. Is worsted by Henry IV. and retires, 368.

Venice, political fituation of, at the time of Charles V. refigning his dominions, i. 20.

Venlo, is besieged by the prince of Parma, ii. 220. Capitulates, 222.

Verdugo, defends Groningen for the Spaniards against prince Maurice, ii. 351.

Vere, colonel, defeats the marquis of Varambon, and relieves Rhinberg, ii. 281. Diffinguishes himself at the siege of Deventer, 310.

Vervins, conferences held there for a peace between France and Spain, ii. 399. The peace concluded, 402.

Viglias, prefident of the council to the dutche's of Parma, regent of the Netherlands, his arguments for receiving the decrees of the council of Trent, i. 168. Offers a remonstrance to Philip against the barbarity of Alva's administration, 212. His objections to Alva's taxations, 283.

Villars, Sieur de, defends Rouen against Henry IV. of France, 314. His vigorous fally to raise the siege, 317. Is defeated and killed before Dourlens, 362.

Vitelli, marquis of, his advice to the duke of Alva, i. 329. His death, 442.

Ulloa, Oforio de, conducts a body of Spanish troops through an arm of the sea, to Duveland, i. 435.

Uluccialli, the Corfair, saves a part of the Turkish fleet from destruction at the battle of Lepanto, i. 262. Is made commander in chief by Sultan Selim, 264. Retakes Tunis from Don John of Austria, 269.

United Provinces of the Netherlands, the first foundation of that republic laid by the treaty called the Union of Utrecht, ii. 66. The fovereignty of them conferred on the duke of Anjou, 117. All allegiance to Philip of Spain folemnly abjured, 121. The prince of Orange affaffinated, 162. Their critical fituation on this event, 203. Offer the fovereignty to Henry III. of France, 204. To queen Elizabeth of Eng. land, 211. Treaty with Elizabeth, 215. Leicester made governor and commander in chief, 217. They remonstrate to him on his arbitrary conduct, 229. Represent their grievances to queen Elizabeth, 232. Prosperity of, 235. Affist Elizabeth with thips to oppose Philip's projected invasion of England, 257. Prince Maurice made governor of Guelderland and Overyssel, 287. Reject the archduke Ernest's offer of treating for peace, 344. Groningen united to the confederacy, 354. Enter into an alliance with Henry IV. of France, 360. dertake their first expedition to India, 372, note. See Netberlands.

Utrecht, the States of, oppose the imposition of the tenth penny, i. 288. Is filled with Spanish soldiers at free quarters, 296. The treaty called the union of, ii. 65.

W.

Walloons, source of the quarrel between them and the Flemings, ii. 50. Commence hostilities against them, 51. Are gained over by the prince of Parma, 64.
Wiat, Sir Thomas, his infurrection in opposition to queen Mary's marriage, i. 9.

Willoughby, lord, succeeds the earl of Leicester in the command of the English troops in the Netherlands, ii. 272.

z.

Zealand, the province of, revolts against the Spaniards, i. 308. Meafures taken there to withstand the Spanish power, 351. The Zealand-ers destroy the Spanish sleet under Adolphus Hanstede at Antwerp, 411. The conquest of that province undertaken by Requesens, 432. Siege of Bommene, 438. Siege of Ziriclee, 440.

Ziricsee, besieged by the Spaniards under Requesens, i. 439. Surrenders, 442.

Zutphen, its situation, i. 348. The cruelties practifed there by don Frederic de Toledo, 349. Is besieged by the earl of Leicester, ii. 225. Is taken by prince Maurice, 309.

N

and - 4 19$3

